The recollection of many times when he had pulled Baxter out of a scrape, often to his own detriment, added fuel to the fire of his resentment. For the first time he saw his friend clearly—selfish, unprincipled, spoiled—to use Mary Morgan's stronger term, "rotten."

Marlin stopped opposite to him and broke into his musings.

"Hinckley wants to get in touch with you," he said. "Promised him I'd tell you if I ran across you. He's probably home by now."

"All right." Caleb's answer was apathetic. For the moment business seemed a dead issue but he roused himself and went to the telephone booths. Hinckley's voice came to him, eager, stimulating.

"I want to go over the ground with you right away," he said. "Just a preliminary, personal survey. We haven't any time to lose. Will tomorrow morning be convenient?"

Caleb responded to the engineer's energy.

"Surely," he replied. "Make it noon."

"Then the Ferry building for the one o'clock Broad Gauge boat. It connects with the Coyote Canyon train."

Caleb went back to his seat. The clubrooms began to thin out and he ordered his dinner. There was no sign of Baxter. When the meal was announced he called the head boy.

"If Mr. Baxter comes in, let me know. I shall be at dinner."

"He won't be in, sir. He telephoned a little while ago to tell Mr. Henley he'd meet him at ten o'clock. They had an appointment outside."

Henley was a man patterned to Baxter's caliber. Caleb had met him and never cared to press the acquaintance. Henley had been Baxter's companion on trips with Mary Morgan and Henley's own special flame. Tonight meant some similar expedition. It probably meant also that Baxter would get drunk.

He finished his dinner with a cigar and walked up to Semaphore hill. There were a few unimportant letters waiting for him, and a small package. He opened it. The jade pendant was inside, the sign of Pisces, returned from Betty Clinton without a word. He held it for a little in the palm of his hand, his thoughts bitter, before he put the trinket away in his desk drawer, which he locked.

Baxter did not materialize. Caleb was up before the night man went off and made certain of that fact. After he had taken his bag to the office and added to it what he needed, he dropped in at the club before he went to the bank. And he met Doctor Fields coming up from the dining room. The physician stopped him.

"Suppose you know about Baxter?"

"No. What?"

"Nothing serious, though this might be a good chance to make him think so. You share a suite with him, don't you? And he didn't show up last night? For cause. Henley brought him home from the beach poisoned—that's the only word for it. They are selling the crudest kind of stuff out at the resort. It's got to be stopped. Baxter arrived literally blind drunk. Eighty-eight per cent crude alcohol with glycerin, a little carbolic acid to give it the bite, burnt sugar for coloring.

"And I'm going to try and put the fear of God and whisky into his heart—or his liver—while he's here in the club under my eye. Let Ted Baxter keep up this game and he'll practically lose his reason, be purely bestial, he might commit any crime—even murder. You're his friend. Do what you can. He'll be fairly fit by tomorrow. The stuff hasn't really got him yet. We'll keep him quiet today with bromides, or something stiffer. You're closer to him than any one else just now, I fancy."

"I'm sorry, doctor," said Caleb, "but we've had a row. Pretty serious one. And I don't know. . . . I've got to go out of town on urgent business for a day or two. . . ."

"Hah! Had a row? Then you can't do a thing. Just aggravate him. Confound him, he's rowing with all his best friends. Not quite responsible perhaps. Good-by, Warner."

Mysteries Found in Dead Letter Office

No place in the world, perhaps, holds as many unsolved mysteries in as many odd forms as does Uncle Sam's dead letter office in Washington, says Popular Science Monthly.

Not only is this mail morgue the final resting place for letters and parcels that go astray because of faulty addresses, but it is also the repository for contraband goods, such as firearms, alcohol and narcotics, as well as deadly bombs and infernal machines. There an ordinary package has been found to conceal enough dynamite to wreck a building. There, too, innocent-looking parcels have given up everything from a live snake or a poisonous tarantula to a flock of fleas.

More than 60,000 carelessly addressed letters arrive every day in this government morgue, which received 21,000,000 letters and 803,000 parcels last year. In this number are 100,000 letters which have been mailed in entirely blank envelopes, many containing large sums of money.

The cash found in misdirected mail amounts to about $55,000 annually.

Hope of Spring

What delights us in the spring is more a sensation than an appearance, more a hope than any visible reality. There is something in the softness of the air, in the lengthening of the days, in the very sounds and odors of the sweet time, that caresses us and consoles us after the rigorous weeks of winter.—Hamerton.

FROCKS OF SUPERFINE CLOTH; HATS SHOW COLOR AND GRACE

WONDROUSLY and beautifully constructed are the cloth frocks of modern inspiration. Not only does this apply to the decorative features, but even more so to the intricate fabric manipulation which abounds in such amazing yet fascinating eccentricities. Seamings the like of which has not been equaled in this generation, plaitings, shirrings, complicated yet skillful cuttings and numberless other artful handlings achieve a labyrinth of unique design which in its final analysis presents an appearance of perfected simplicity.

This very beautiful afternoon frock in the picture is a worthy exponent of the newer type of highest grade designing. Of indescribably fine wool rep is this exclusive model. Its shapeliness is achieved through a series of remarkable cuts and seamings which at one point traces a stitched-down bolero patterning. There is also a suggestion of a belt introduced at the sides, the same being cut in one piece with the front. The arrangement of fine box plaits under the arm describes a matchless styling. The jeweled link fastening at the throat, also the exquisite needlepoint embroidery done in refined colorings, impart the final notes of elegance.

Cloth dresses, such as this one, of most formal character, bespeak the reigning mode. For these, wool rep of superlatively exquisite quality is a favorite medium. Garnet and rust colorings are quite in the lead, with also a conspicuous presence of brilliant clear blues. Capes, boleros, wing draperies enhance the waist portions.

Sleeves are a very important factor in the making of the gown. The deep armholes are the latest whim of fashion. Sometimes the seam where they are sewed into the dress is concealed under an elaborate embroidery or appliqué. In fact, fine needlework embroidery done in flowery pattern and happy colors imparts the necessary touch of ornateness to many a frock of cloth.

When it comes to becoming hats, youth is now having its own sweet way, for the newly arriving models cater most successfully to the whims and fancies and various individualities of the young girl. Brims turn up and brims turn down, but always with a charm that denotes a careful study and consideration of the millinery needs among juniors. So that the enthusiasms of youth be not discouraged, designers are giving the girl in her teens unrestricted choice of materials and mediums of which her hat should be fashioned. Velvet or felt, hatters' plush, satin or ribbon, it matters not. Becoming! that is the one guiding thought.

That youth will look its loveliest in the autumn and winter hats designed especially for its members, is readily told in a glance at this picture, wherein is portrayed five models selected from the season's choicest junior millinery modes. Each individual type bespeaks an important trend in youthful headwear styles. It is the gray krimmer facing on the upturned brim of the top hat to the right, which claims distinction.

The fact that the other little hat at the top of the group is of hatters' plush with a velvet brim, bespeaks the coming popularity of these fabrics.

Stitched velvet, of outstanding interest, is the medium for the hat centered to the left. It has a trimming of silver ribbon.

Ripple, ripple goes the brim of many a graceful hat for fall, and this applies to the brim whether off the face or gracefully framing the face. The soft undulations of the velvet cuff on the cunning shape centered to the right are outlined with colorful buttonhole stitching. The last hat in the group is an exquisite velours, having, of course, a creased crown.

TRIAL OF WALTER MOUNTZ NOW IN PROGRESS

The trial of the City of Auburn against W. W. Mountz, former collector of the Auburn water and light department, and the American Surety Company of New York, opened at Albion Wednesday before Judge Arthur F. Biggs and a jury in the Noble circuit court.

A jury in the DeKalb circuit court found Mr. Mountz not guilty last January on a criminal charge of embezzlement.

The city hopes to collect $5,000 and interest from the surety company. The total amount of the shortage, according to the city's contention, is $8,030.53. All transactions of the office during Mr. Mountz's tenure, from April 1, 1922 to July 31, 1925, will be subject to inquiry and it is predicted by counsel that the trial will require two weeks. The defense while admitting a shortage, denies that Mr. Mountz was responsible for it.

The city will be represented by Capt. W. D. Stump and former Judge Dan M. Link of Auburn and former Judge L. H. Wrigley of Albion, while defense attorneys will be Edgar W. Atkinson of Auburn, Finley A. Nash of Garrett and Arthur W. Parry of Fort Wayne.

BLOOMINGTON ENTERTAINS FOX HUNTERS

Bloomington, Ind., Oct. 6—President H. H. Evans of the Indiana and Southern Indiana Fox Hunters Association says more than fifty thousand citizens of Indiana and adjoining states will attend the annual meeting of this organization in this city.

Local committees have procured and mapped a forty acre field at outskirts of the city and the program of the week, 10 to 16, will be staged on this field, with exception that the running of foxes will cover most of Monroe and adjoining counties.

Older members of the association declare this meet is staged on a larger scale than any of the fifteen preceding it and that the attendance will be the largest in the history of this association.

INDIANA'S TRIBUTE TO WAR HEROES WORTHY OF STATE

Takes the Form of Magnificent Shaft in Center of Indianapolis.

Indiana continues to write in stone the history of the deeds of its sons and daughters. The latest chapter is that of the World war.

The site of the memorial is on a plaza of five city blocks in the heart of Indianapolis, two blocks from the Circle, from which the Soldiers' and Sailors' monument, honoring veterans of the Civil war, dominates the city.

This massive shaft, the greatest of the many state monuments to Indiana's noted sons to be found in various parts of the capital city, has become so well known through the world that it is really a sort of trademark for Indianapolis as well as Indiana. A decorative shaft 285 feet high, including the bronze statue, its light gleams over the whole city.

It wes designed by Bruno Schmitz and cost more than $500,000. Although it was erected primarily as a memorial to Civil war veterans, it brings the stone history of the state well up toward the World war era, with four epochs commemorated by the statues of George Rogers Clark, William Henry Harrison, James Whitcomb Riley and Oliver P. Morton grouped around its base, which is ornamented with statuary groups and reliefs in stone and bronze symbolic of Indiana's industries and the achievements of its warriors and foremost civilians.

Monument in Honor of Indiana World War Veterans in Heart of Indianapolis.

The World war memorial takes up the history where the Soldiers' and Sailors' monument left off.

Fostered by the Legion.

The project was began in 1920 and was fostered by the American Legion. The proposition was taken up readily by the people. Business men, seeing in the plan to embody in the structure offices for the national headquarters of the American Legion a means of assuring Indianapolis the permanent home of the organization, supported the enterprise.

The bonus never appealed to Indiana, but the Memorial plaza idea was accepted as an opportunity for its citizens to show their gratitude to its soldiers in a beautiful and dignified manner.

The legislature provided for trustees, donated three entire city blocks in the heart of Indianapolis and appropriated $2,000,000 for construction. The three blocks include the site of the Indiana State School for the Blind and two small parks owned by the state but maintained by the city. The state-owned property is in two sections. The tracts were separated by two blocks of privately owned property. To give the site an uninterrupted stretch of five blocks additional legislation authorized a bond issue for the purchase of the two intervening blocks and gave the trustees power to accept the property as a gift.

The city turned over to the trustees a deed for all the property in one block, with the exception of the sites of two of the oldest churches. The county presented the trustees a deed for the entire remaining block in the plaza site. There was a controversy over a proposal to condemn the sites of the Second Presbyterian and First Baptist churches. The trustees of the memorial finally assured the church trustees that the religious edifices would not be disturbed.

Shrine 192 Feet High.

The design of Frank B. Walker and Harry E. Weeks, Cleveland, won in a contest. The central structure is a tower or shrine 192 feet high, 96 feet square, topped by a pyramidical dome, flanked by a low building 20 feet in height, to serve as a base for the shrine and to extend from it on all sides. The shrine will be flanked by two smaller buildings of harmonious structure to be used for offices of the Legion and other patriotic organizations, leaving the central unit for memorial purposes.

Numbering the blocks in the plaza site from south to north, the central unit or memorial shrine will be in the second block, between and behind the two churches, which are situated on the southeast and southwest corners. The central building will face the south.

The two buildings erected for utilitarian purposes will be at the extreme northeast and northwest corners of the plaza, directly across from the Indianapolis public library and separated from the central shrine by two blocks of landsceped park. One of the buildings will face Meridian street, which borders the plaza on the west. The other will face on Pennsylvania street, eastern boundary of the plaza.

Comparison of Congressman's Promises with His Record.

That David Hogg has worked energetically to carry out his platform promises two years ago is shown by the following comparison:

WHAT HOGG STOOD FOR IN 1924

Taxes must be substantially reduced and reduced now. The burden of taxation upon farming, productive enterprise and the maintenance of families makes taxation not only an economic question but also a moral issue.

..There must be an immediate decrease of the number of government employees.

..The Railray Labor Board should be eliminated.

..Co-operative marketing of farm products on a larger scale should be encouraged. Farmers are entitled to the benefit of handling their goods from production to final consumers.

Collective bargaining by association of labor to secure better working and living conditions and other advancement for labor are entirely commendable.

Disabled veterans and their dependents of all wars should have unstinted relief at once. Theirs is the first call on National resources.

Women are entitled to the same consideration as men. All legislation must b based upon its final effect on the comfort and happiness of the American home.

The American people need a revival of respect for those fundamentals of law and government which our fathers preserved in the Constitution—our Ark of the Covenant.

The people of the Twelfth District need a representative in Congress who possesss the qualities tive leadership.

WHAT HOGG HELPED TO DO IN 1925-6

Reduced $360,000,000.00 from the annual tax burden. Increased personal exemption of head of family to $3,500.00 and relieved 2,300,000 persons of Federal taxes. Repealed most stamp taxes, special and excise taxes.

Thirty thousand government employees have been dispensed with by limiting appropriations.

The Railroad Labor Board was abolished.

Co-operative marketing to be organized on a comprehensive scale by assistance of Department of Agriculture in a manner wholly agreeable to all co-operative organizations.

Enactment of a law establishing a new method of settling labor disputes on railroads which has the unqualified approval of employees and employers.

..Increased compensation of world war veterans to total of $700,000,000. Spanish war veterans and widows were given increase of $18,500,000. Civil war veterans were increased to $72.00 and $90.00 per month.

Mothers' Pension system established in District of Columbia so that whenever possible dependent children may have the benefit of home care instead of being sent to public institution.

Deportation of alien criminals; change of bankruptcy law to prevent frauds; revision of civil service retirement law and a national public building program, as enacted, is wholesome and necessary legislation.

Mr. Hogg was elected to membership on the major Committee of Post Offices and Post Roads which controls legislation of the largest business in the world. Has taken care of 5,400 personal requests. Secured passage of nine special bills. Blocked building of an addition to Fort Wayne Post Office.

SCHOOL ENROLLMENT 4,873 DECREASE OF 48 PUPILS

Concord Township Shows Increase of 7 and Spencer 1.

At the close of tthe first month of school, some interesting facts as to the enrollment this year are shown in a report of County Superintendent Clarence Green.

The total enrollment of all schools in DeKalb county, rural and city this year at the end of September was 4,873 as compared with 4,921 a year ago.

This was made up of 1,979 pupils in the elementary grades in the rural schools of the county, 1,895 in the schools of the towns and cities and 999 in the high schools. Last year there were 2,154 in the elementary grades and 2,767 in the corporation and high schools. The net decrease this year in the attendance is 48.

The attendance in the township schools, according to a comparative report of the year 1926 and last year follows, the first figures being for the current year and the second for the year 1925: Butler township, 131-138; Concord township, 152-145; Fairfield township, 143-140; Franklin township, 166-192; Jackson township, 183-171; Keyser township, 222-221; Newville township, 84-84; Richland township, 109-126; Smithfield township, 264-269; Spencer township, 108-107; Stafford township, 80-84; Troy township, 82-92; Union township, 35-38; Wilmington township, 220-206.

The comparison in the city and town schools follows: Auburn, 1,119-1,118; Garrett, 833-848; Butand with Grant township including 62 last yar; Corunna, 96-95.

Health That Vanishes Can Be Found Again

Modiste Now Being Congratulated by Friends on Her Surprising Recovery. Nervousness, Headaches and Sleeplessness Relieved

If good health is slipping from you; if indigestion, nervousness, kidney disorders and ailments caused by a run-down condition torture you, benefit from the remarkable experience of Miss Sarah Hyndman, 334½ E. Columbia St., Ft. Wayne, Ind., a successful dressmaker.

Sitting in her comfortable home, Miss Hyndman recently said: "My condition was unbearable. Headaches and nervousness wore down my strength. Even a short shopping trip would tire me out. I had no appetite for food. And I suffered from indigestion which caused burning pains.

"In search for good health I began taking Tanlac. It righted everything for me, strengthened my nerves so I could work and sleep well which gave me new vitality. I am feeling stronger and healthier than ever. I eat everything without a thought of pain. This great tonic surely saved me from years of suffering, banished pain and built up my strength."

Fortunate men and women are now enjoying the benefits of good health and vital strength, thanks to Tanlac, made from roots, barks and herbs.

Learn from their experience and good health and strength can be yours, too. The first bottle of Tanlac shows amazing results. Ask your druggist for Tanlac—today! Over 40 million bottles sold.

ORANGE GELATIN FOR YOUNG OR OLD

Good Way to Increase Day's Supply of Vitamins.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Orange gelatin is a dessert that's easy to prepare and thoroughly wholesome. It should be made of fresh orange juice, except for the small amount of water needed to soften and dissolve the gelatin, and the sugar. The idea is to increase the day's supply of vitamins by those contained in the oranges. Nutrition specialists in the United States Department of Agriculture point out that it is especially important if you have children in the household to give them orange juice as often and in as many forms as possible. Elderly people, too, who must often be careful what they eat, may have this delicate and delicious dessert without fear of bad results.

Fruit gelatins take only a few minutes to prepare. The proportion is usually one envelope of gelatin to one quart of liquid. Put one envelope or one ounce of gelatin into one-half cup of cold water to soften for about two minutes. Squeeze as many oranges as you need to make 2¼ cupfuls of strained juice and add the juice of half a lemon, to intensify the flavor. Put one cupful of water on to heat with ¾ cupful of sugar or less, depending on the acidity of the fruit. When the sirup is boiling, take it from the stove and put the moistened gelatin into it. Stir until the gelatin is entirely dissolved, then mix with the orange and lemon juice. In this way the orange juice is not cooked at all. Strain and pour into a large mold, or into individual molds if you like. You do not need any sauce with this orange gelatin, but a soft custard would be good with it, or plain or whipped cream.

Steam Pressure Does Not Remove Food Vitamins

Cooking foods under steam pressure does not generally destroy the vitamins in the foods, says the United State Department of Agriculture. Of the three best-known vitamins, only one, commonly called vitamin C, is easily affected by the ordinary cooking processes. The presence of air and long-continued heating seem to aid in the destruction of this vitamin. In the case of foods requiring long cooking in the ordinary way, cooking in the air-tight pressure cooker would probably be less destructive to this vitamin than the usual method.

Quantities of Pile Fabrics

The wearing qualities of pile fabrics depend very largely upon whether or not sufficient extra yarn has been used to hold the pile into the body of the fabric. It is always well to examine such fabrics very carefully and note how readily the pile can be pulled away from its foundation.

Laundry Equipment Must Not Be Placed Too Low

Sometimes a comparatively simple change in the placing of one's household equipment makes a great difference in the comfort and convenience of the worker. In discussing home laundering, the United States Department of Agriculture points out that the working surface of nearly all laundry equipment is too low. This places the woman operating it so out of balance that she is soon fatigued or makes it impossible for her to use force where it counts most.

The top rim of the washtub should be placed so that the worker does not stoop from the shoulders. If you use portable tubs, raise the height when necessary by regulating the height of the bench; stationary tubs can be set permanently at the best height for the worker. Washing on a board is done chiefly about half way up the side of the tub, not at the bottom, so adjust the washboard accordingly. If it is too high, cut part of the legs off. The ironing board also should be at such height that the pressure exerted by arm and shoulder can be used to the best advantage. Try out several arrangements until you are sure that you have the best.

Remove Iron-Rust Stains From White Kitchen Sink

Iron rust stains may be removed from a white-enameled kitchen sink by bleaching them out with a solution of oxalic acid, the United States Department of Agriculture says. Buy one ounce of the white crystals of oxalic acid at the drug store and add them to an eight-ounce, or half-pint, bottle of water. Be sure to label this poison and keep it out of the reach of children. Pour a few drops of this strong solution of the acid on the rust spots, rinse it off with clear water, and repeat until the stain disappears. If the acid is allowed to remain on the sink it will injure the enamel.

SURPLUS CABBAGE MADE INTO SAUERKRAUT

Preparing Cabbage for Sauerkraut.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Surplus cabbage may be made very easily into sauerkraut, which is a valuable food. Unless very large quantities are desired, four and six-gallon stone jars are the best containers. Small quantities of sauerkraut may be stored in quart glass jars in the way described below:

Select only mature, sound heads of cabbage. After removing all decayed or dirty leaves, quarter the heads and slice off the core portion. For shredding, one of the hand-shredding machines which can be obtained on the market is much the best, although an ordinary slaw cutter or a large knife will do.

Fermentation Carried Out in Brine.

In making sauerkraut the fermentation is carried out in a brine made from the juice of the cabbage which is drawn out by the salt. One pound of salt for every 40 pounds of cabbage makes the proper strength of brine to produce the best results. The salt may be distributed as the cabbage is packed in the jar or it may be mixed with the shredded cabbage before being packed. The distribution of two ounces of salt with every five pounds of cabbage probably is the best way to get an even distribution.

Pack the cabbage firmly, but not too tightly, in the jar or keg. When full, cover with a clean cloth and a close-fitting board or plate. On the cover place a weight heavy enough to cause the brine to come up to the cover.

If the jar is kept at a temperature of about 86 degrees Fahrenheit, fermentation will start promptly. A scum soon forms on the surface of the brine. As this scum tends to destroy the acidity and may affect the cabbage, it should be skimmed off from time to time. If kept at 86 degrees Fahrenheit the fermentation should be completed in six to eight days.

Set Sauerkraut in Cool Place.

After fermentation is complete, set the sauerkraut in a cool place. If the cabbage is fermented late in the fall, or if it can be stored in a very cool place, it may not be necessary to do more than keep the surface skimmed and protected from insects and dust. It is better, however, according to the United States Department of Agriculture, with sauerkraut made in small quantities in the home, to preserve it in the following way: As soon as the kraut is fully fermented, pack in mason jars and cover slightly with the kraut brine, or if this is not possible, with a fresh brine made by adding one ounce of salt to a quart of water. Heat in a water bath until the center of the jar shows a temperature of about 160 degrees Fahrenheit, then seal tightly. If stored in a cool place sauerkraut can by this method be preserved in good condition for a year or more.

POULTRY

TURKEYS REQUIRE PLENTY OF RANGE

Once upon a time every farm family had its flock of turkeys, which supplied plenty of birds for the home table and some for the tables of those who lived in the towns. Turkey raising in recent years, however, has decreased, one of the main reasons for this decline being that as the population of the country increased farming became more intensive and the area suitable for turkey raising was reduced. Turkeys require plenty of range in order to thrive.

Many farmers, however, still consider turkeys a profitable side line on the farm, and about the first of October begin to consider how to put more flesh on their turkey flock.

During the summer and early fall turkeys can find an abundance of feed on the average farm. Grasshoppers and other insects, weed and grass seeds, green vegetation, berries and grain picked up in the fields all go to make up the turkey's daily ration. When this natural feed is plentiful, very little need be added until fattening time, except for the purpose of bringing the turkeys every night to roost and to keep them from straying from home. For this purpose one feed of grain every night just before roosting time is sufficient.

In fattening turkeys for the market an excellent plan is to begin about October 1 to feed night and morning, feeding only so much at a time that the birds go away a little hungry, and gradually increasing the quantity until they are given all they will clean up three times a day during the week before marketing. By the latter feeding is meant that they are fed until they leave the feed and walk away. Some turkey raisers feed wheat and oats during the first part of the fattening season, gradually changing to corn as the weather becomes cooler. The majority, however, begin feeding heavily on corn about November 1; and, since turkeys are not accustomed to such heavy feeding, scours often result, especially if new corn is used. New corn can be fed safely if the turkeys are gradually accustomed to it by feeding lightly at first and more heavily afterward.

Confining turkeys during the fattening season to prevent their using so much energy in ranging has been tried to some extent, but with very little success.

Provide Good Mash Feed to Increase Egg Laying

The average hen would lay 20 eggs more per year if she was supplied with a good dry mash all year round, according to the poultrymen. Most of the eggs would be laid during the period of the year eggs are highest in price and the income from them would more than repay the cost of the extra feed consumed.

Many farm flocks are permitted to scavenger for their feed at this time of year. Their ability along this line is not nearly as great as is often thought. If all hens were provided with a good mash throughout the year they would molt later in the year and the new feathers would develop rapidly. The rest period would therefore be reduced considerably. Dry mash given in the summer months is a good insurance of higher egg production during the early winter months.

Poultry Hints

Sell the roosters as soon as the hatching season is over.

If you are interested in eggs alone, there is no better variety than the S. C. White Leghorn.

Stable floors need to be stable. Make them of concrete and they'll outlast generations of cows.

Six ducks would be a little too many for one drake, although one drake could go with four or five.

The ration that will make the pullets lay the most eggs is not necessarily the most economical ration.

A coat of whitewash now and then is bad for the lice but good for the hen.

The man who believes in signs says that the hen that blunts her nails scratching is the grandmother of the 200-egg hen.

If you are interested in both eggs and market poultry it will be more satisfactory to get some of the general-purpose varieties like the Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes, Rhode Island Reds or Orpingtons.

The surplus cockerels should go to market as fast as they reach marketable size.

It pays to keep the different size chicks separate. The larger ones will hog the feed, and delay the development of the smaller ones.

• • •

In selecting the pullets you are going to keep, do not make the mistake of choosing simply the ones that are largest. Size is an important consideration, but it is not the only thing by any means.

Welsh Bards in Yearly Session

Once upon a time (Sixth century) Welsh harpers cast their harps into the River Conway, dived in themselves, swam, towed, hauled out their harps upon the further shore, plucked manfully but inaudibly at sodden strings. Followed a troop of Welsh singers. Having swam the Conway they sang no better and no worse than before. Prince Maelgwn Gwynedd of North Wales thereupon welcomed the singers to the first recorded Welsh Eisteddfod, heaped their palms with gold, banished his harpers, proclaimed the confirmation through "trial by water" of his pet theory: That song is superior to instrumental music. Since then the Eisteddfod (literally "cession," actually "contest") of Welsh bards has become a yearly recurrent cultural diversion.—Time.

Attributes Long Life to Closed Windows

"No fresh air" is the lifelong policy of Connecticut's oldest woman, who is mentally bright at one hundred and eight. Although confined to bed, Mrs. Sarah Bosworth Bradway ate a hearty birthday dinner of pork chops, fried potatoes, and mince pie, the latter served piping hot in good New England fashion. She is probably the first centenarian ever to attribute remarkable longevity to having lived with as little fresh air as possible. Aaron Bowen, village storekeeper, whose wife is one of Mrs. Bradway's two living daughters, has the greatest respect for her no-fresh-air policy. "If mother'd ever had a window open ah'd have caught cold and died 50 or 60 years ago," he declares. "Course, I'm only seventy-five, but I never had a window open at night in my life. And I calculate to live to be a hundred or more myself, as long as I keep the windows shut, anyway."

In a Kansas City federal court the other day the defendant, Ruth Kelly, twenty-five, was charged with selling morphine. The prosecutor for the government, Margaret Latchem, twenty-one, slender, bobbed-haired girl, was trying her first case. When the judge fixed Ruth's sentence at seven months Ruth burst into tears—the disgrace of going to jail appalls even bad women. Then all eyes were turned on the girlish prosecutor. She saw the prisoner's tears. Her own chin quivered in womanly sympathy. Otherwise she retained her composure. . . . It was a contest between professional dignity and a woman's heart and professional dignity won by a narrow margin.—Capper's Weekly.

Home Bureau Activities

The ladies of the Home Bureau Club entertained their families and a few invited guests at the school house last Friday evening, the occasion being their annual guest night.

Following a year's work on "Nutrition," a playlet was put on entitled, "On the Road to Health and Happiness." The entertainment committee consisted of Mrs. Clara Foltz, who directed the playlet, Mrs. Katie Storer, Mrs. Marie Trostel, Mrs. Gladys Hull and Mrs. Ethel Shilling.

The program was opened with a piano duet by Miss Ethel Lindley and Mrs. Gertrude Borthwick, readings were given by Virginia Shull, Beatrice Storer, Eloise Draggoo and Margaret Hamilton. Vocal duet by Helen and Garnet Washier; violin solo by Miss Dorothy Ginther accompanied by Miss Martha Miser; a male quartette composed of Messers Woodcox, Eyler, Sechler and Staman, gave a pleasing number and responded to an encore; a bobbed-hair quartette consisting of Mesdames Lindley, Hamilton, Washier and Borthwick, also gave a number and responded to an encore; a "skit" was given by a gentleman whose voice very much resembled Ed Storer, but whose outward appearance more nearly resembled the king of the cannibal islands. The Home Bureau Orchestra disguised as Sousa's Band gave several numbers, playing on mouth organs, fine tooth combs, bells, horns, a tambourine, and a drum with a broken head. Mrs. Marie Draggoo beating same vigorously with a couple of large preserving spoons.

After the program all were invited to the basement where supper was served by the township project leaders, Mrs. Gladys Hull and Mrs. Marie Draggoo, assisted by the menu committee, Mrs. Mary Krise, Mrs. Cora Curie, Mrs. Nelia Morr and Mrs. Nellie Lindley.

Mrs. Millie Shull has been president for the past year and with the help of the township project leaders and the co-operation of the club members, the club has finished their year's work on "Nutrition" and are making preparation for county achievement day in November, which will close the year's work. All feel it has been a pleasant and profitable year.

Last Friday evening while the Home Bureau Club was having their entertainment upstairs in the school house, four high school boys went into the Domestic Science room where the ladies had their supper set out and helped themselves, eating all they wanted and picking over and "messing" up the cakes so they were hardly presentable for the guests.

Last year a couple of the boys did the same thing only last year the plates were already prepared so the theft was less noticable and unknown to the majority of the ladies.

These boys have been carefully raised in good homes by good parents, aside from that fact the boys have reached an age of accountability and know right from wrong.

The names of the boys are known to the club members but are with held from publication out of respect for the parents who are among the best people in St. Joe. The ladies feel that an apology from the boys would be acceptable and partly square the matter.

SECHLER CHILD IS DROWNED IN FISH CREEK

Jack Sechler and wife of six miles north and one mile east of Butler, are passing through a deep sorrow in their home, because of the loss of their youngest child. The little feellow had been playing in the creek near the home and possibly had fallen down and strangled. The mother missed him and after a search, found the body a distance down the creek. Upon investigation, tracks were found where h had been playing in the sand and water, at a point where they drove across the creek.

The water was higher and swifter than usual.

The obituary is as follows:

Waldo Donald, the youngest child of Harley and Carrie Sechler, was born on this farm April 29, 1924 and departed this life September 30, 1926, at the tender age of 2 years, 5 months and 1 day.

Waldo was a bright and cheerful in this home.

baby, he was a ray of sunshine

He leaves to mourn father and mother, one brother, Walter and sister, Vera, grandfather Bleeks and grandmother Sechler and a host of friends and relatives.

The funeral was held from the home Saturday at 1:30 with burial at Newville. Rev. Haines of Edgerton officiating and E. R. Kinsey, funeral director.

CARD OF THANKS

We wish to express our heartfelt thanks to the neighbors and sympathy shown in this very dark hour of our life's experience also for the fine floral tributes.

NEW NUMBERS ON STATE ROAD BECOME EFFECTIVE

State highways in Indiana Friday were renumbered completely following the successful attempt to change the numbers on all highway markers within the entire state in one day.

The renumbering program became necessary to conform with th Federal bureau of roads plan which includes the marking of three U. S. highways across Indiana.

The feat of changing the numbers on all state highways within one day was one of the greatest tasks of its kind ever accomplished, according to John D. Williams, director of the State Highway commission.

The present markers are only temporary and will be replaced as soon as 18,000 permanent markers of steel are received, Williams stated.

"When the new markers are in place, Indiana will have the best marked system of state highways in the country," Williams declared. "It will be virtually impossible for anyone to lose his way on an Indiana State highway.

"Warnings are also being placed at traffic hazards which cannot be removed at the present time," Williams said.

The temporary markers make no attempt to distinguish between classes of roads but the new permanent markers will distinguish between State and Federal roads.

In the new numbering system, State officials gave the even numbers to east and west roads while north and south roads have been given odd numbers.

MORE FISH FOR THE STOCKING OF RIVER

More fish were placed in the St. Joe river last week by the state hatchery. 500 yellow bass measuring from three to six inches were turned loose near St. Joe and a quantity were put in waters at Orangeville. Only a few weeks ago 2,000 rock bass of about two inches in length were placed in the river. All of this work is being done through the efforts of the Fish and Game Club of St. Joe, and should receive your support and encouragement by joining the club.

LUTHERAN SERVICES ARE RE-ARRANGED

By special arrangements, Rev. A. H. Keck of South Bend, president of Michigan Synod of the Lutheran church, will be at St. Joe Sunday morning and preach at 9:30, with Sunday School to follow and Spencerville services will be in their regular order with preaching at 10:30. This change in order of services is made to accomodate the speaker so that he can be in South Bend for evening.

FIND THE TROUBLE THEN APPLY REMEDY

Monthly council of the Christian Sunday School was held Monday night at the church. The subject discussed was, "What is the Matter with this Sunday School?" Mr. Storer, the superintendent, had invited all the knockers to bring their hammers and knock the Sunday School, which they did. The result is that several things were found which could be improved on, and several things done to better the school, having once found out what is the matter with a Sunday School maks it easier to find out what to do to better it.

A social hour followed which was in charge of the Loyal Sons and daughters class. In spite of the very rainy evening about thirty Sunday School workers were present and all felt profited by being there.

SPORTING GOSSIP

The St. Joe High School boys won their first base ball game of the season Tuesday evening when they downed the fast Leo High School aggregation by the score of 4 to 1.

The game was marked by good fielding, superb pitching and somewhat loose base running by both sides. All four of the locals runs were made in the fourth inning on two hits, a base on balls and two passed balls. Coburn held Leo to three hits and gave no walks, while VanZile was touched for four bungles by the locals and issued five five passes and hit one batter.

Why bake your face and freeze your back—

When you can heat the whole home with only one fire?

SUNBEAM CABINET HEATER

This winter, don't move into one or two stove-heated rooms. Don't wear a shawl or coat to keep your back warm, while you toast your feet. Install the Sunbeam Cabinet Heater and you can live comfortably in every room in your home in the coldest zero weather.

This wonderful heating plant circulates warm air like a furnace instead of radiating heat like a stove. It requires no basement, but fits into your living-room or dining-room like any other fine piece of furniture. It is easy to take care of and replaces zero or three stoves, making possible substantial savings in fuel.

We'd like to have you look it over today.

KILLED AT COLLEGE FARM, SUNDAY

Injuries suffered while filling a silo caused the death at Lagrange, Ill., Sunday of Orien Murphy, 21, Hicksville man, who three weeks ago entered Broadview College at Lagrange. Both he and his wife were preparing to become missionaries of the Advent church.

M. Murphy, while assisting in the filling of a silo on the college farm, was accidentally struck across the lower abdomen by a broken pulley. The injury was so serious, an operation was necessary. He was not able to rally and death ensued before his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Murphy, could reach his bedside. They were on the way when death occurred.

He is survived by his wife, Dorothy Widney Murphy, adopted daughter of Otto and Berneice Widney of Hicksville, O., to whom he was married April 1; his parents, five sisters and two brothers.

Funeral services were held Wednesday at 2 P. M.

The Murphy family reside near Colestown and are relatives of the Mrs. Jane Coburn family.

CHRISTIAN SCHOOL LOOSES IN CONTEST

During the past summer the St. Joe and Newville Christian Sunday Schools were in a contest, the winning school to be entertained by the loosers. As a result the St. Joe Christian Sunday School will entertain the Newville Sunday School with a two session meeting and dinner at the St. Joe church, Sunday.

The two Sunday Schools will meet for Sunday School at the usual time, 9:30; communion and fellowship service at 10:30. Other features of the day's program will be a male quartette, Exercise by Loyal Beginners, readings by Mrs. Meade Baker and Miss Priscilla Borthwick, a solo by Miss Dorothy Scholes and an address by Rev. Boyts of the Auburn Christian church.

WILLIAM KNISELY, WELL KNOWN BUTLER MAN, DIES

William Knisely, of Butler, one of the most prominent business men of that city, a brother of T. J. Knisely, former president of the Knisely bank at Butler, who now resides in Fort Wayne, David Knisely of Medina, Ohio, also a Butler banker and Mrs. Warren Mason, wife of the president of the Knisely bank, died Monday morning at Butler.

Mr. Knisely was a retired merchant who for many years conducted the William Knisely & Son department store in Butler. He was born in Troy township. He is survived by his widow besides his two brothers and sister.

WANTS HIS BROTHER-IN-LAW REMOVED

Judge Endicott has set for hearing October 20 at 9 a. m. a petition filed by Frank H. Filley of Huntington, for the removal of his brother-in-law, Harry A. Kees, as executor of the will of the late Addie Filley of St. Joe.

Mrs. Filley died in 1919. She owned some personal property and two houses in St. Joe. In her will she directed her executor to sell the property "as soon as may be" after her death. Then $500 was to be paid to a sister, Sarah E. Bartlett, and $100 each to her son, Frank, and her daughter, Nina Kees; the residue of the estate going in equal shares to the three children. The third child is Belle Woodcox.

Mr. Filley says in his petition to the court that one tract of real estate was sold for $700, but that the other tract has been rented at a nominal rental. He alleges that Mr. Kees has neglected to sell the property, although he had offers, one being for $1,800. Mr. Filley declares Mr. Kees has not tried to sell the property; that it is deteriorating in value through neglect and that taxes and the costs of administration are consuming the assets of the estate.

The court is asked by Mr. Filley to appoint a disinterested person as administrator to settle the estate.

SUFFERS STROKE OF PARALYSIS

Last Friday afternoon F. M. Monroe was stricken with paralysis, while preparing to go to his doctor, as he was accustomed to for several weeks. He had driven to the filling station for air and while there he remarked of feeling queer. His wife called for help and he was taken home. Today he is reported improved and able to sit up a little.

His duties at the depot have been taken care of by Mr. Winters, who is relief agent and on Wednesday Mr. H. E. Goshen was checked in and will have charge until Dick can return to his work.

INDIANA BOY SENTENCED PUT SPIKES ON TRACK

Placing obstructions on railroad tracks was characterized as a severe offense by Judge James A. Collins in Criminal court yesterday in sentencing Russell Phillips, 18 year old, of Ben Davis, to serve a year at the Indiana state farm. According to witnesses Phillips placed twelve railroad spikes on the Pennsylvania tracks near Ben Davis which were removed shortly before a New York-St. Louis fast mail train passed. Judge Collins said that such acts might result in heavy loss of life and great expense to the railroad company. Phillips said he did not think the pikes would wreck the train. Children who are permitted to play about the railroad will do these things, unconscious, of course, as to the real danger of such acts.

SENATOR WATSON IN HOSPITAL

Due to an automobile accident, Saturday, Senator James E. Watson, is confined to an Indianapolis hospital for this week, at least. He was badly bruised and cut about the head.

"I've been in many a battle, but never a bloody one like this," he said between stitches.

"This crash has damaged me more than the Democratic party in a lifetime," he added.

Ideal VECTO Heater

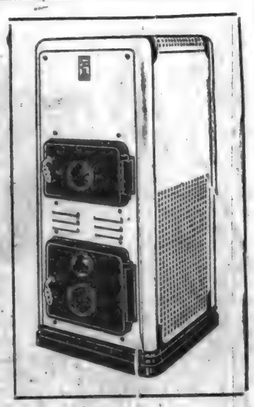
BETTER Warmth with GREATER Economy

For Solid Comfort, Health, and the Utmost in Economy

DO you want your little home to be a place of cheer and comfort? Clean to live in and safe and healthful for the children? Do you want it to be snug and warm in every nook, and at the same time have the pleasure of knowing that you are actually saving money on your coal bills?

It is all within your reach.

A compact, self-contained, beautiful heating unit has been perfected which warms, not one room, but a whole home—and yet consumes only as much coal, or less, than is now used by old-fashioned methods to heat one room! This is the Ideal Vecto Heater.



Its warmth is clean and healthful. It requires no basement for installation; it is an ornament in any room. For more or less heat, you need but turn a handle. Compact and selfcontained, it may be moved like furniture. It burns either coal or wood, and will serve you faithfully and efficiently during your lifetime. The price of the Ideal Vecto Heater is very low; and you can enjoy its warmth and comfort while it is helping to pay for itself by its economy in fuel consumption. This truly wonderful Heater has been developed in our Institute of Thermal Research, the largest heating laborstory in the world.

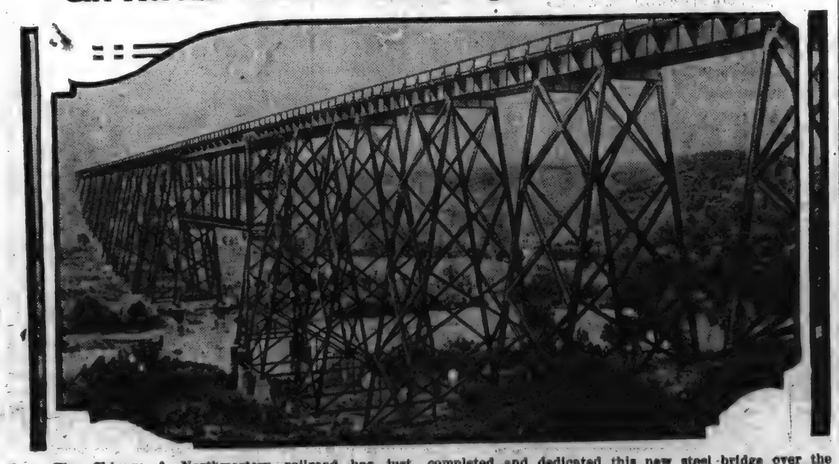
Title Float in Harvest Pageant Parade at Omaha

The grain-growing states of the Central West, the bread-basket of the nation, for the thirty-second successive year celebrated the close of the harvest season with an elaborate fall festival pageant at Omaha under the auspices of Ak-Sar-Ben. The big events were the electric parade on Wednesday night, September 29, and the great costume ball on Friday evening, October 1. That pictured above is the title float of the harvest pageant parade. Other floats pictured in elaborate detail the agricultural resources of the central western states. The pageant is the occasion of one of the big annual gatherings of the states of which Omaha is a central point.

Girl Heroine Honored in Naming of This New Bridge



The Chicago & Northwestern railroad has just completed and dedicated this new steel bridge over the Des Moines river, between Boone and Ogden, Iowa. It has been christened the "Kate Shelley" bridge in memory of the heroine who, in 1881, then a girl of fifteen, risked her life by crossing the old long trestle structure to warn an approaching train that the bridge was about to go down. A violent storm was raging. Her daring deed gave her national fame and a rich reward. She died in 1912.

THE REPORT OF THE SPIES

LESSON TEXT—Numbers 13:17-14:45.
GOLDEN TEXT—We are well able to overcome it.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Two Brave Spies.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Two Against Ten.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Brave and the Cowardly Scouts.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Courage of Faith.

I. The Spies Sent Out (13:17-20).

Less than two years have passed since the Israelites were delivered from Egyptian bondage. They are now at Kadesh-Barnea within sight of the promised land. Moses urged them to go in and take immediate possession (Deut. 1:21).

The record in Deuteronomy 1:19-25 shows that God did not take the initiative in sending out the spies, but that the people because of lack of faith made the request. There was a threefold purpose in sending out the spies.

1. To see whether the land was as God had told them (v.18).

2. To see whether the people who dwelt there were strong or weak, few or many (v.18).

3. And to see whether the cities were made up of strongholds or of tents (v.19).

II. The Commission Executed (13:21-25).

They entered the land from the south and traversed it to its northern limits. On their return from the north they gathered some specimens of the fruit of the land.

III. The Spies Rendered a Report (13:26-33).

1. The majority report (vv. 26-29).

(1) The land floweth with milk and honey (v. 27).

As a proof of it they displayed the fruit.

(2) The people who live there are strong (v. 28).

(3) The people lived in walled cities (v. 28).

(4) The land is inhabited by giants (v. 28, cf. 33).

In comparison with the inhabitants of the land they saw themselves as grasshoppers. Furthermore, they saw the people so distributed—the Amalekites in the south country, the Hittites, Jebusites and Amorites in the mountains, and the Canaanites along the seacost—that it was impossible to conquer them.

2. The minority report (vv. 30-33).

In part this report agreed with the first. It did not ignore the difficulties, nor dispute the facts, but it did deny the conclusion of the majority. They did not minimize the task before them, but asserted with God's help that they were well able to get possession of the land, and urged immediate action.

IV. The Rebellion of the People (14:1-45).

This rebellion began by crying (vv. 1-3). They lifted up their voices and cried, and the people wept that night. They even wished that they had died in the wilderness or in Egypt. God took them back to wander in the wilderness for thirty-eight years.

2. Proposition to return to Egypt. (vv. 4-10).

Their crying was followed by a proposal to organize for the return to Egypt. They purposed to select a captain as their leader. Joshua and Caleb protested against this, which so exasperated the people that they were about to stone them. At this point God interposed in their behalf.

3. God's wrath upon the people (vv. 11-12).

Because of their unbelief He proposed to smite them with pestilence and to disinherit them, supplanting them with a nation mightier than they.

4. Moses' intercession in behalf of the people (vv. 13-19).

Moses plead with God against this judgment because the Egyptians would hear of it and blaspheme and this they would pass on to the other nations, saying that God was not able to bring them into the land.

5. The Lord's response to Moses' plea (v. 20-39).

He assured Moses that He had granted pardon according to his intercession, but told him that although He would bring them into the land according to His promise, yet with the exception of Joshua and Caleb the men of that generation should be debarred.

6. The presumption of the people (vv. 40-45).

Having in unbelief refused to go up at the command of Moses, now in presumption they go. Moses advised them against such presumption, saying, "the Lord will not be with you."

Caleb was still bitter enough himself to feel scant sympathy with Baxter's condition, serious as Fields considered it to be. Baxter hadn't been drunk when he went to Hermanos valley to talk with Betty and her father.

Hinckley was waiting for him at the Ferry building. The engineer had managed to subtly but completely disguise himself. In old, baggy tweeds, with a shabby hat and a battered bag, he looked like an unsuccessful farmer. The keenness of his eyes was dimmed by yellow-lensed spectacles with imitation tortoise shell rims. He looked approvingly at Caleb's rough clothes.

"That's the idea. No sense in us looking like tourists or in any way prosperous or otherwise obtrusive. I'm fairly well known over there, too, and, if it got out I was smelling around the hill, the price of real estate would be apt to soar immediately. There is always the chance of Oakville learning something and suspecting more.

"There's a big lot of watershed we'll have to accumulate to insure purity. And you've got to be canny. Your role is that of a foolish young Easterner with money on whom land worth comparatively little may be unloaded at a fair price. A price they will think big until the project is complete.

"It's fair enough all round," he went on. "We'll pay 'em more than market value because at present there is no actual market for their land, hasn't been for years, not likely to be. The boat's in."

Through the waiting room windows they could see the trans-bay passengers filing past to the exits. Caleb, released from attention to Hinckley's talk—they had stood apart from the crowd—suddenly caught his breath. Less than ten feet from him, in front, were Betty Clinton and her father. They were going back to El Nido. That was evident and it suited Caleb. Before he returned to Golden he could carry out his intention of seeing them. Baxter could wait. So he dallied until Clinton's spare figure found a way through the thinning crowd that tailed onto the Ferry apron and, with Betty following, climbed the stairs to the upper deck. Hinckley went forward to the open end with Caleb. They were among the first off the ferry, first through the gates to their train.

Hinckley and Caleb took rooms at the same hotel that Caleb had patronized. Part of their trip was to be made in a car shabby enough to preclude any idea of wealth for its occupants, part in a buggy, on horseback, and afoot.

Caleb took the lead and conducted Hinckley up Hermanos canyon, into the Boca-Blanca valley, to the source of Gabilan and around about the Sink itself. The third day was given up to an inspection of the foothills that bound the Sink and a checking-up of Caleb's demonstrations in proof of the clay that underlay the gravel and lined its sides.

"I am entirely satisfied, so far," said Hinckley when they returned to their hotel after this last trip. "This is Saturday. I'd like to call a halt until Monday. I always aim at spending the week-end in the bosom of my family, if I can compass it. We have done famously. I can confirm your findings with enthusiasm, my son."

Hinckley nodded at the young man with a smile that radiated health and good nature. They had got along wonderfully in their common interest in a project that promised full success.

"Goin' to leave us?" The landlord of the hotel came out upon the verandah where Caleb and Hinckley were chatting. Rain had fallen heavily and held them indoors to check over the notes and maps they had made. Now it was clearing up.

"I'm going to Golden on the fourten," said Hinckley. "Be back Monday. Mr. Warner—are you coming with me, Warner?"

"I think not. I'll do a little fishing. Maybe take a shot at those quail we saw on Gabilan. You'll find me here waiting for you."

"Cloudburst up country," said the hotelkeeper. "This here local rain was the tag of it. Crick's risin' fast. Black as sin over Gabilan. She's a weather-breeder, is that old mountain. Power of current comin' down stream after this little spat of weather."

"Let's go out and have a look," suggested Hinckley.

Coyote creek had risen, was rising, in a volume that testified to the truth of the landlord's assertion that there had been a cloudburst. He accompanied them to the bridge, scorning any waterproof for the now swiftly falling rainfall and the three leaned over the rail and watched the sliding torrent of brown water. Caleb marked the waterline on the cement of the bridge abutments, noting it by certain stains in the cement. It was covered within five minutes by as many inches.

"Rising fast," he commented.

"She'll rise for an hour or so after that bust," said the landlord. "She comes a kiyootin' an' a tootin' in the winter when Gabby gets to makin' rain in earnest."

Caleb saw Hinckley off. Then he ordered a lunch put up. The landlord made little comment as he handed it to him.

"If you aim to be out late you better take a slicker along," he said. "By the feel of the air an' my rheumatic knee, old Gabby ain't through yit. Likely to be another cloudbu'st afore sundown. Black as the inside of pore Sal over thar."

Caleb thanked him and took his advice. He was bound for Hermanos valley and he crossed the bridge and started up Hermanos creek with his shoulders squared and his jaw set. Nothing was going to prevent him getting an audience with Clinton. He had certain things to set forth and, stormy though that interview would probably be in the beginning, he would let himself hold no doubt as to its favorable conclusion.

CHAPTER XII

On the Bridge

It was a five mile walk to the canyon head, another mile to the ranch. In Caleb's condition the distance, both ways, meant little. He knew the dining hour at El Nido. It was five when he set out and this should bring him to the junction of valley and canyon in the early evening. A pipe to top off his cold supper and he would arrive at the ranchhouse soon after the Clinton meal was over. So he would stand the best chance of finding both Betty and her father at home, would be apt to find Clinton in congenial mood.

The darkness deepened to premature nightfall as Caleb reached mid-canyon. The trail was dim and water, racing down the canyon sides from the storm, had rendered the track slimy and treacherous, slackening up his pace. He filled his pipe and lit it. Before the bowl was glowing evenly there came a moan from the south, the boughs above him creaked and bent protestingly and the breeze blew chilly down the trail. Leaves and twigs came fluttering down in the dusk.

Caleb put on his slicker. Thick though the leafy screen above him was, he felt sure that a heavy downpour was imminent. The first drops of it spatted heavily on the green thatch before he had gone a hundred yards. Then, suddenly, effectively, as if the bottom of some aerial cistern had given away, the rain drove down, beating through the trees in vertical lines, plumping into the swollen creek, hissing in continuous spouts that flattened thickets and pitted the soft soil, rattling on Caleb's oilskin like a discharge of small shot, with force enough to be distinctly felt.

There was little actual danger. Caleb could easily scramble through the brush to immunity at any moment. And he pushed on. He could see the path fairly well though this was the twilight hastened by the still overcast sky. He trudged on at the best pace he could master over the slippery red soil but, when he came to the final bend, the neck of the bottle, it was so dark that he could only make out the suspension bridge by its silhouette where it crossed the gut of surging torrent, close to the footboards. Soon it would be over it.

Caleb doubted whether the bridge would stand any great resistance to water pressure. He remembered fissures in the rocky buttresses where the cables were anchored, fissures ever widened and deepened by successive winter assaults of storm waters. He was hungry and he decided to eat his supper and wait for moonlight before he crossed the gut and struck the ridge trail down to El Nido.

By the time he had finished eating a tremulous light above the western ridge proclaimed imminent moonrise and the efforts of the luminary to conquer the already retreating masses of cloud in their disorderly flight.

Caleb stepped onto the bridge cautiously, either hand on the guide-rope of steel wire, held up by iron stanchions that were bolted through the floor planks. The structure shuddered under his tread as he felt his way along. Suddenly the rhythm of its trembling changed and became so irregular as to force him to a standstill. The jolting increased. Some one else was on the bridge, coming from the valley side. Was it Padilla?

He held his ground. The boards were not wide enough to permit of two passing breast to breast. They would have to sidle about each other. If it was Padilla and the Mexican wanted to dispute the crossing, there would be trouble. Caleb was not going to turn back. He hesitated whether to call out as the other came on, his tread sounding distinctly.

Then the moon suddenly broke through its veil and sent a transient ray into the mouth of the gorge. Out of the dark, as if a spotlight had been projected against a black curtain, staring at Caleb while he stared back, leaped the face of Ted Baxter: the features incredulous at first, swiftly changing, before the light failed, to a sneering, taunting mask. His voice sounded out of the dark as the light vanished.

"What the devil are you doing up here?"

The query held a scornful emphasis that aroused in Caleb such a swift, consuming hatred in answer to the challenge, as he had never known himself capable of. This man, within reach, once his friend, had done him treacherous injury. Now was the time to strike a balance.

"I've been looking for you, Baxter," he said. "Though I didn't exactly expect to meet you here. I know everything you've done. It's opened my eyes. I had an idea that you were fairly decent, that you possessed at least some remnants of honor, some rags of friendship. You haven't got any more principles than a yellow cur. You . . ."

"I haven't, eh?" broke in Baxter. The moon came glimmering through again. "Because I've bested you in a business deal where you thought you were so almighty smart, you get sore! You went sneaking around yourself, trading on friendship and pretending to make love to a girl, so that you could find out what you wanted about Hermanos valley and then have it condemned for a reservoir. You talking about honor! You tried to hoodwink Clinton and I found it out and saved him. Rags of friendship? You pretended to be my best friend and, when it came to a showdown, you lied to me and said you didn't have any money. Why? Because you lacked the backbone to come out and say so, because you were so d—d Yankee, afraid you might lose a penny."

A lurch of the bridge, a sudden wrench. A chilly wave slopped over the boards. It flowed about the ankles of both of them. Caleb stood with one hand free, the other on the hand-rope, balancing himself, whipped to fury by each word of Baxter. But he did not interrupt him. He was waiting for the light to get stronger. He could see the other but dimly, his face thrust forward, shooting out his words, trying to make them sting deeper.

"That was business and I got the best of you. To h—l with all that! That isn't what you're sore about. It's because I've cut you out with the girl. Why don't you own up to it?" Baxter laughed mockingly.

"You don't suppose, you poor boob, that she would ever look twice at a man like you as a lover. You've got diluted maple sirup in your veins. She's got blood, red, hot! I kissed her less than half an hour ago. I—"

Fury overmastered Caleb. Baxter had touched the sensitive core of the whole matter—Betty Clinton! He leaped for his man and felt the well-aimed, smashing impact of Baxter's fists to neck and jaw as he himself drove hard to the body. But the straight punch that nearly found the fatal "point" jolted him badly and left him dizzy. He grappled to a clinch as the moon sailed out, wading through a shallow sea of spindrift clouds.

Distinct Type of Physical American

The average American is taller by nearly an inch than Europeans, according to Dr. Ales Hrdlicka, the anthropologist, who recently completed physical measurements of 4,000 Old Americans. By "Old Americans" are meant those native citizens whose parents and all four grandparents were born in this country.

The average height of American men was found to be 5 feet 8.6 inches, while the women averaged 5 feet 3.7 inches.

The examinations indicate, says the New York Times, that a distinct American physical type now exists. Characteristics include slenderness, narrow hands and feet, prevalent brown hair, face of longish oval, notably reduced cheekbones, relatively long nose, moderately developed jawbone and thin lips.

Going back to the early Eighteenth century to show that every innovation in dancing has met with violent opposition, a writer in Liberty Magazine says that it was in 1912 that Mabel Hite, an actress, and Mike Donlin, a ball player turned vaudevillian, who was Mabel's husband, brought to Broadway the first turkey trot New York had ever seen. Right there decently ordered terpsichore expired.

COAT-DRESSES ARE FASHIONABLE; DRESSY COAT TYPES ARE POPULAR

Coat of Superior Styling.

WE ARE so apt to think of the coat-dress as conveniently tailored and of cloth. In the strictest sense of the word, this is true, but it happens this season that fashion is not carrying out very many of her schemes in the "strictest sense." The trend is toward a note of dressiness throughout the newer styles. That accounts for the presence of so many charming coat-dresses, not always of cloth, but often of a suitable silk weave, preferably satin or faille, these showing a fetching feminized styling which employs cunning trimming treatment.

One of the smartest notes is the introduction of hemline fullness achieved by plaitings or circular movement. It is noticeable among recent imports that a very fine plaiting is favored, such as is used in the coat-frock in this picture. It happens that this particular model is black, but it might just as well have been in any of the new shades—say ruby, garnet, chanel red, jungle green, rust or cinnamon. The vogue is very pronounced for colorful satin street dresses.

Coat-Frock Model in Black.

Most street frocks are enlivened by a gayly printed scarf or jabot. In the instance of the dress pictured, a bandanna-print vestee and jabot are combined.

Designers are expressing a fondness for the diagonal closing for the one-piece street dress. The latest fastening is accomplished with buckle and strap. This offers endless opportunity for clever effect, as the buckle may be very showy if one so elects.

An outstanding quality which recommends crepe satin for the practical somewhat-tailored daytime frock is its adaptability to the self-trim handling. Some stylists are going so far as to use the dull crepe side for the dress proper, reserving the luster satin finish for the trimming.

The last word in fashion for the satin street dress is the heavy silk cord and tassel which ties at neck and waistline.

Responding to fashion's clarion call for more feminized styling of our apparel, many of the distinctive coat types for autumn and winter are glorifying fabric elegance with an embellishment of enriched trimming treatment.

Expressing a note of elegance are handsome novelty woolens which show gleaming gold and silver threads interworked with the weaving. These new fabrics are the sensation of the season when it comes to unusual cloakings.

Sometimes the demand for dressiness of appearance is met with artful fabric handling. This feature is instanced in the coat of superior styling here pictured. It achieves an ornate treatment through applique of one cloth upon another. Cut-outs of rust-colored suede-like cloth are patterned on a black background of like fabric, in a wide bordering on both hemline and bell-shaped sleeves. There is a cunning intermingling of metal thread stitchery until the entire suggests an intricate embossed effect, quite like handsome tooled leather-work. The fact that this wrap-around coat accents the slender silhouette confirms the style-message that straight, narrow lines are still decidedly in good form. Of course, there is a fur collar, this time of black lynx, for a fur collar is inevitably in the season's styling of coats.

A lavish machine stitching done in gold and silver threads strikes a new note in cloth decoration. Most alluring is a navy suede-like cloth coat stitched with gold and silver in rows just above a banding of black shaved lamb. There is a narrow belt of gilded kid, while the lining is of vivid red crepe.

Among fabrics of elegance black velvet and black suede-cloth take precedence for daytime as well as evening wear.

HABITS AND CONTROL OF THE CORN BORER

How To Recognize Them And Proper Methods Of Prevention

(Courtesy News-Tribune)

Following is an article from the U. S. Department of Agriculture on the habits and conditions pertaining to the European corn borer, with information as how best to handle the matter.

Cut all corn close to the ground and as early in the season as possible. In case of small fields, use a short-handled hoe for this purpose.

Low cutting attachments for use on many of the ordinary corn harvesters can now be purchased from local farm machinery dealers at reasonable cost. These attachments should be obtained and used for this season's harvest so as to destroy practically all the European corn borers in the fields. Many of the new corn binders to be placed on the market this year will have low cutting attachments.

High Stubble Shelters Many Borers

Cutting cornstalks by hand or with machines in a manner which leaves stubble from 12 to 24 inches in height allows numbers of borers to remain in the fields, thus serving to increase the infestation the following year. If, for example, only one stubble in 100 is infested with one borer each, this averages 100 borers to the acre. Ten out of each hundred borers are killed by winter conditions, leaving 90 borers per acre. About one-half of the remaining borers (or 45) develop into female moths and each of these females lays about 150 eggs. Thus 45 female moths will lay a total of 15,750 eggs on the corn plants. This shows the importance of cutting stalks low, even where the infestation is only slight.

In the fall of 1925, in some areas in the Lake Erie region, borers were present in the stubble in dangerous numbers, and commercial damage was closely approached.

Extensive observations made by a representative of this department in Europe, particularly in Hungary during 1925, showed that in communities where the corn was cut close to the ground and the stalks regularly burned, fed, or otherwise disposed of, the infestation and damage by the European corn borer were very slight. In communities where the corn was cut in such a manner as to leave high stubble and where general farm clean-up was not practiced, infestation and damage were very heavy.

In cultivating fields where cornstalks or corn stubble have been plowed under during the previous fall or this spring, it is important to remember that this material should not be dragged to the surface. Where this is done many of the borers find favorable refuge in the dragged-up portions and thus escape destruction. A disk harrow should be used in cultivating these fields, if possible, instead of a toothed harrow. A disk drill should be used in sowing.

Place the corn in silo early, taking precautions to cut low. Borers contained in silage are killed either by mechanical injury or through conditions existing within the silo.

Feed or destroy stalks of early sweet corn. This is important because when the stalks dry out, the borers migrate to near-by weeds and can not be destroyed by the regular harvesting methods. There are now available portable silage machines, equipped with attachments for low cutting, which cut the stalks close to the ground and in the same operation reduce the fodder to finely cut corn, thus destroying the borers contained therein. Such fodder can be placed in the silo or returned directly to the ground.

Early sweet corn planted as a trap crop should be fed or destroyed not later than August 15 by the methods previously described.

Regulations in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan require low cutting of cornstalks and general destruction of corn refuse.

All agencies engaged in clean-up work are intensely interested in helping the corn growers of this country to combat this pest. They are trying to develop methods that will cause the least possible additional cost in handling the corn crop and which at the same time will keep the corn borer from doing commercial damage. Remember that should this pest cause a 10 per cent crop loss, this condition will very materially affect the growing of corn. Such a loss may occur in the very near future in some localities in case thorough clean-up measures are not adopted. It becomes a matter of great personal interest to every farmer within and surrounding the areas now infested to endeavor to conform with the regulations promulgated by his State.

Habits of the Borer

The principal methods for controlling the European corn borer are based upon the fact that the pest spends the late fall, winter and spring (until June) as a fully grown worm or borer, in any part of the corn plant large enough to serve as a hiding place. This means any part of the stalk, leaves, stubble (except the very small hairy roots), cobs and husks. Under conditions of bad infestation a small number of the borers may also pass the winter in large-stemmed weeds or grasses growing among or close to, the corn.

It is during the over-wintering period that the borer shows the weakest link in its existence and it then may be destroyed easily by burning, feeding to livestock, or other methods previously described. If left until later than June 1, the borers change first into reddish-brown, shuttle-shaped pupae (the resting stage), and then into moths which fly to the new crop of corn and lay their eggs to produce another brood of borers. The method of combat, therefore, consists in killing the borers in their hiding places before June and, to be safe, preferably before May 15.

After about two weeks in the resting stage the parent moths appear during a period extending from about June 15 to early August.

The habits of the moths have been carefully studied. They fly during the evening or early morning and therefore are seen only rarely. In daylight they remain concealed underneath the leaves of various plants or in thick growths of weeds and grasses. In the moth stage the European corn borer can not be successfully destroyed. Various trap lights and poisoned baits have been thoroughly tested and found to be useless under ordinary conditions.

It has been determined that the moths can fly for a distance of at least 20 miles. During windy periods the direction of flights is with the wind. Large bodies of water do not check their flight as the moths have been seen to alight on the surface of the water and again take flight.

This ability of the moths to fly long distances makes it necessary that clean-up operations be efficiently conducted on a community-wide scale. The moths emerging from a single poorly cleaned, infested field are sufficient again to infest near-by fields even where precautions have been taken to dispose of all infested material in these fields.

Beginning about the middle of the last of June and until early August, depending upon the character of the season, the eggs of the European corn borer may be found on the under surfaces of the corn leaves. Sometimes they are placed on the upper surface of the leaf. The egg masses are irregularly shaped and usually about one-eighth of an inch wide. Each mass contains from 15 to 20 eggs, overlapped like fish-scales. They are white when first laid, later turning pale yellow and becoming darker with a black area just before the borer hatches. By closely examining the under surface of corn leaves it should be possible for any person to find these egg masses in fields where the moths are numerous. In the egg stage, the control of the corn borer has not proved practicable, because the eggs are laid over a long period of time and therefore several applications of insecticides are necessary to obtain even partial destruction of them.

The eggs hatch in from four to nine days, depending upon weather conditions.

The young borer immediately after hatching is about one-sixteenth of an inch long. Usually it feeds for a short time upon the surface of the leaf, near its place of hatching, or upon tender leaves and tassels in the growing "bud" of the corn. As the borer grows it bores into the tassel and stalk at any convenient point, often entering the stalk at or near where the leaves join it. From June 15 to about July 15 the work of the borer in the plant may remain unnoticed, but a close examination will reveal small holes made by it in entering the stalk and small masses of sawdustlike castings which it has thrown out.

Beginning about July 15, particularly on early corn, many tassels on infested plants break over because the borer has hollowed out the tassel stem. These broken-over tassels, with masses of castings near the breaks, are at that time the plainest sign that the European corn borer is present. By cutting open such broken tassel stems the offending borer often may be found, in its burrow, a few inches below or above the break. Not all corn plants infested by the borer have the tassel stem broken over. In such cases the borer may be found in other parts of the plant.

After August 15, during an ordinary season, the damage inflicted by the borers is very noticeable. At this period many of them have become nearly full grown. In this case the injury to the interior of the plant may be readily detected by the presence of small holes in the stalk and large masses of white or bright yellow castings, which have been thrown out by the borer, clinging to the plant. Upon cutting open the stalk near these holes the borer usually may be found within its burrow, although in some instances it deserts one plant and enters another near by. In late summer and fall many of the infested plants break over at the point of greatest injury to the stalk, especially when subjected to strains by high winds or heavy rains.

During the worm or borer stage the European corn borer is so well protected by hiding within the plant that it is not practicable to destroy it by the use of any known insecticide.

As soon as the corn forms ears these may be entered by the borers at practically any point—through the husk, through the silks, or through the ear stem or "shank." Once inside the ear the borers feed upon all parts of the grain, silks, and cob, often burrowing down through the center of the cob, or diagonally through it.

Usually it is possible to detect infested ears by the same signs as have been described for the stalks. Sometimes, however, the entrance hole made by the borer in entering the ear is so small, or so well concealed, that the question of infestation can be determined only by stripping off the husk and breaking or splitting open the cob.

Naturally the transportation of the infested ear corn from infested to uninfested territory is sure to spread the European corn borer. For this reason strict quarantines are maintained by the State and Federal Governments to prevent the transportation of such material.

Infested ear corn of the previous year's crop, when allowed to remain in cribs through June, July and early August, acts as a source of new infestation for the reason that the borers within the cobs change to moths which emerge and lay their eggs on the new crop.

In the region of the Great Lakes most of the borers reach full growth about August 15. At this time they are nearly an inch long and about one-eighth of an inch thick. They continue feeding, or simply boring in the plants, until cold weather halts their activities. The winter is passed as a fully grown worm or borer, as previously described.

Several kinds of common, native caterpillars, "worms," or borers are often mistaken for the European corn borer, thus causing needless alarm. Some of these are similar in appearance to the European corn borer, but others, although very different in appearance, cause damage that often resembles it.

It is important that all corn growers be on the lookout for the European corn borer. Therefore, when any specimens of worms, caterpillars, or borers suspected of being the European corn borer are found, they should be placed in a tight tin or glass container, together with a few strips of crumpled paper and sent to the nearest corn borer laboratory. Such laboratories are located at 17 Division Street, Silver Creek, N. Y.; at Sandusky, Ohio (address P. O. box 283,) and at Monroe, Mich.

Entombed Miners Rescued After Five Days

Scene at the mine of the Pabst company in Ironwood, Mich., where three men were killed and forty-three others entombed by a cave-in. Desperate efforts to release the imprisoned miners were made by clearing the blocked shaft and by tunneling from another mine, and a hole was drilled for the purpose of supplying them with food in tablet form. After five days all were rescued.

The Social Register—Can You Figure It Out?

The Social Register is coming into the limelight. That holy of holies sacrosanct roster of society's elite is no longer mentioned only in awed whispers. It is now on the lips of the man on the street, even as the telephone book or the city directory! And who brought the sacred book from its uncontaminated, exclusive reserve into such unwanted fame? Why the people it is throwing out!

Being thrown out or "dropped" or "eliminated" from the Social Register is taking almost epidemic form. It seems to be getting more and more difficult for those for whose edification it was formed to live up to its requirements for permanent membership! And if things keep on as they have recently, we do not know what the S. R. will do for enough names to keep it a regular sized book!

A couple who are old "regulars" of the S. R. drag each other through a messy scandal and both are dropped. Of course that is comprehensive even to us humble folk who cannot (and do not) aspire to its lofty columns! Then comes the dropping of a young woman, one of the "top notchers," for marrying "beneath her." That, too we can understand, by just putting ourselves in the exalted place of the S. R.!

Try as we may, however, to elevate our viewpoint to that of the arbiters of social prestige, we cannot understand the latest "drop" of one of its favorite daughters for marrying a count! It is true that she did not remain long by his noble side; but without even the detail of a divorce so familiar to real society, she is dropped from the S. R. An honest-to-goodness count, with a title and estates and even a perfectly live mother to prove it—by all the known rules his title should double her space in the S. R. Instead of that she is dropped. What does the S. R. want anyway? And to make matters still more inexplicable, rumor has it that on the strength of a reception recently given for the young woman, under appropriate auspices, she is to be reinstated. Can you figure it out?

Some one told me of a woman who has been taking part in a veritable game of "in again, out again," in the S. R. Through the course of two marriages and two divorces she has been in and out of its pages four times! Some one has suggested that handicapped by its limitations as to new members, which is something that every successful directory must have, the S. R. must make some changes and supply excitement of some kind in order to sell the books! And yet they say they don't like to get into the papers. Can you figure it out?

"Woman's Work"

Some time ago a woman in New York returned unannounced from a hospital to surprise her husband, who had been left in charge of their five children during the month she had been under treatment for a nervous breakdown. She found him near death as a result of gas he had taken in an attempt to take his life.

The man admitted that it was caring for the home and five children that had been too much for him and had driven him to suicide.

His wife had had nervous prostration, but she could not afford the luxury of suicide. Her children needed her, so she returned from the hospital to get back on the job which had led him to try to take his life.

This item of news should be of interest to all husbands who wonder why their wives look tired when they come home in the evening, who cannot understand why anything should go wrong with the dinner or the house.

It is an answer to men who say to their wives, "What do you do all day, anyway? Nothing but a little housework and looking after the children."

It may be enlightening to him who wonders why his wife does not more resemble the girl she was when he married her, why she cannot retain her girlish figure or her youthful charm.

It is a challenge to him who compares her with the lady who swings her legs behind the footlights.

One man was driven to suicide by the care of a home and five children; many would not survive the care of two or three. At least it may be conceded that a home and two or three children without help is a full-sized job worthy of any woman or any man. Also, that any man, no matter what the importance of his work, can afford to take his hat off to any one of the thousands of women who are holding down these jobs without getting into the newspapers, without indulging in nervous prostration, without even making complaints.

It is these mothers who never think of throwing up the sponge who just keep doing the tasks that sometimes almost overwhelm them, who daily give evidence of greatness, and are the heroes of the race.

HIGHER THAN WOOLWORTH BUILDING

Year's Sales of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

MRS. ED. DAUGHERTY
1308 ORCHARD AVENUE, MUSCATINE, IOWA

The Woolworth Building in New York City, which towers 792 feet above the street, is the highest building in the United States.

If all the bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound sold in 1925 could be placed end to end, they would make a column as high as the Woolworth Building with enough left over to extend from Lynn, Massachusetts to Cleveland, Ohio.

In many little villages as in many thriving cities along the route, who are glad to tell others about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

In a recent letter, Mrs. Daugherty says, "I was ill for four months before I took your medicine. I found one of your books at my front door and read it. It seemed to fit my case, so I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and after I took the third bottle, I found relief. I am on my eleventh bottle and I don't have that trouble any more, and feel like a different woman. I recommend the Vegetable Compound to every one I see who has trouble like mine. I am willing to answer any letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. Ed. Daugherty, 1308 Orchard Avenue, Muscatine, Iowa.

Mrs. Carr Also Helped

Muncie, Indiana.—"I could not get around to do my work. I took treatments and they did me no good. I had always heard of Lydia E. Pinkham's medicine and I thought it would be like all the others, but I found out after I took half a bottle, as I have proved it wonderful. I am taking it yet and I can do all my work. I am feeling fine now, and it is your good medicines that have done it. I tell every woman of the good I get from taking the Vegetable Compound and from using the Sanative Wash."—Mrs. P. W. Carr, 721 West Powers St., Muncie, Indiana.

GOOD USE FOR WINDFALL AND POOR APPLES

Preparing Apples for Canning.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

To prevent wasting windfall and imperfect apples, and also the varieties that cannot be successfully stored, can them. They may be put up ready for use as sauce, in pieces suitable for pies, or whole, boiled in a sirup or baked as for serving. Green apples make a particularly good sauce, spiced if you like the flavor of nutmeg or cinnamon.

Water-Bath Method Favored.

In the latest publication on the subject, Farmers' Bulletin 1497-F, "Canning Fruits and Vegetables at Home," the United States Department of Agriculture recommends the water-bath method for canning apples. Pie apples should be pared and cut into the sizes desired. If the pieces must stand, place them in a mild salt solution (one-fourth cupful of salt to one gallon of water) to prevent them from turning dark. They may be packed directly into jars and covered with boiling hot thin sirup, made by heating together one part sugar and three parts water. Process quart and pint glass jars for 15 minutes in boiling water and No. 2 and No. 3 tin cans for ten minutes.

Apples packed raw shrink in canning so that the containers are not full. This can be prevented if they are boiled for five minutes in the sirup before packing. In this case fill the apples into the jars hot, cover with sirup boiling hot, and process containers of all sizes for five minutes in boiling water.

May Also Be Baked.

Apples may also be baked as for serving, adding sugar to taste and water if necessary. They may be spiced and colored with cinnamon drops for special occasions. Pack hot in the containers, cover with hot sirup and process containers of all sizes for five minutes in boiling water.

Apple sauce is cooked and sweetened to taste, then packed boiling hot and processed immediately for five minutes, whatever size container is used.

STUFFED CHICKEN BAKED VERY GOOD

Matter of Wet or Dry Stuffing Is Problem.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Select a plump young chicken weighing from 4 to 5 pounds for baking. If you need a larger chicken it would be better to get a capon or to buy two weighing 3 or 3½ pounds each. There should be plenty of meat on the breast and thighs. The end of the breastbone should be pliable and the skin beneath the wings should break easily. A young bird will have few hairs but a good many pin feathers. The feet are soft. Singe the hairs, if there are any, remove the pin feathers and wash thoroughly. Rub the outside of the chicken over with butter, salt and pepper, and prepare a stuffing. The matter of wet or dry stuffing is one of universal controversy. The United States Department of Agriculture recommends one that is dry and is made as follows: Pull out the center of a loaf of stale bread and rub between the fingers till the crumbs are even in texture. A quart of crumbs will be about enough for a four-pound chicken. Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter in a pan and cook in it a tablespoonful of minced onion till tender but not fried. Mix the melted butter and onion with the bread crumbs, add about a tablespoonful of salt, according to taste, and a little black pepper. Add half a teaspoonful of poultry seasoning or mixed sage and thyme if you like it. Here's another good stuffing for those who like the wet kind: Three cupfuls of finely broken stale bread, one teaspoonful of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful of pepper, one-half teaspoonful ground sage and thyme (more sage than thyme), one and one-half teaspoonfuls of baking powder, four tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful minced onion, two stalks of celery, chopped small, one-fourth cup of boiling water. Cook the celery and onion in butter five minutes. Mix with the bread, baking powder, seasonings, and hot water, and fill the cavity in the chicken, putting a part in the space formerly occupied by the crop. Sew up the cavities and start the chicken in a hot oven with a temperature of 450 degrees Fahrenheit, with a cupful of hot water to keep it from drying out. Reduce the temperature as the chicken begins to brown. Baste frequently. Bake from an hour to an hour and a half if the chicken is tender. The giblets are put through the food chopper and simmered in another pan while the chicken is baking. The liquor used to baste the chicken should be added to the giblets in making the gravy.

Red Sediment in Water

The red sediment in some well waters consists of oxide of iron which was held in solution by carbon dioxide in the form of ferrous bicarbonate. When the water is boiled or allowed to stand, the carbon dioxide escapes in the form of a gas and the iron oxide, commonly called iron rust, is precipitated. It gives the water an unpalatable appearance but is not harmful.

Macaroni With Cheese Is a Most Excellent Dish

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Macaroni with cheese may be prepared in the morning and reheated at dinner time if you wish. Break up a cupful of macaroni or spaghetti into small pieces and cook in two quarts of boiling salted water until tender. Drain in a strainer and pour cold water over it to prevent the pieces from sticking together. Make a cheese sauce by adding from one-fourth to one-half pound of cheese to a cupful of plain white sauce. Reserve a little of your cheese to grate over the top of the dish. The proportions for the white sauce are: 2 tablespoonfuls of flour, 2 of butter, and a cupful of milk. Grate or cut up the cheese and melt in the sauce. Season with ½ teaspoonful of salt and a few grains of cayenne pepper.

Now put the macaroni in a buttered baking dish in alternate layers with the cheese sauce. Scatter the extra grated cheese over the top, with some buttered bread crumbs. At serving time, heat in the oven until the crumbs are brown and the sauce and macaroni are thoroughly heated.

Buttermilk Is Compared With Whole Fresh Milk

The question is sometimes asked as to how buttermilk compares in its vitamin content with whole fresh milk. The United States Department of Agriculture says: Whole milk contains vitamins A, B, C and D. Vitamins A and D are soluble in fats and vitamins B and C are water-soluble vitamins. Consequently when the butterfat is removed from milk there remain in the skim milk or buttermilk only such amounts of vitamins A and D as are proportionate to the amount of butterfat which has escaped removal. Buttermilk probably contains most of the vitamins B and C originally present in the milk, and some A and D, depending on the amount of butterfat remaining.

Gelatin Is a Protein

It is often asked to what class of food products gelatin belongs. Gelatin is a protein. It contains most of the amino acids found in other proteins, but is lacking in certain ones that are essential for the normal growth and development of animals. It is, however, a useful article of food in a dietary including other proteins from well-diversified sources, and is especially useful as a supplement to milk.

POULTRY

BALANCED RATION NEEDED FOR HENS

Students of hen science believe that an ordinary bird should be able to produce a thousand eggs if we knew how to give her a fair chance.

She is a wonderful machine, with the embryo of more than a thousand eggs in her make-up, but so many things combine to prevent her from doing her best that she generally falls away short of such production during her few years of life.

If you like to count eggs before they are laid, you may figure the matter out to suit yourself—so many pounds of grain, meat, lime, fat, fiber and water to each dozen eggs—and there you are.

All would be well, and you could begin at once to count your eggs, if it were not for the fact that "something always happens" to prevent the regular machine-like production desired.

Certainly we must be careful to supply the needful ration so that fat, protein, nitrogen, fiber, ash or mineral and water will be fed. This is necessary, because no eggs can be produced if one of these elements is lacking.

The fowls must be kept in condition or they will not "shell out." This is one of the most difficult parts in our whole plan of egg production.

The grains are high in nitrogen and protein. Meat scrap, bone and meat meal are high in fat and protein. When the flock is out on the range, young and old pick up what they instinctively seek as needful.

Some of the prepared feeds are mixed so that just about the right proportion of each needed element is in the ration. Sometimes the birds do not seem to like the ration as mixed for them, so the plans of the scientists do not work out.

Molting Period Is Good Index of Value of Hen

Hens that are in the midst of molting do not, as a rule, lay. The time of the year when molting takes place is, therefore, a reliable index of the value of the hen to the flock for the reason that a hen molting in wrong season, when she should be laying, can deprive the flock of more profit than would be the case had she molted early enough to be laying at the peak of high prices.

The "early molter" is not, however, a good layer, as a rule. Molting usually starts with the neck, then the body and finally the tail and the wings. It takes, usually, three months for the molting process to be fully completed. While it would seem that the early molters would be the best winter layers, actual experiments have proved that such is not the case.

These tests held by various experiment stations have brought out the fact that egg production controls the molt rather than the molt controlling the egg production. So long as laying is continued the molting will be postponed. And it is quite universally conceded that the late molter is the best layer. In fact, it seems to be a standard rule on commercial farms now and in the experiment stations to discard the hens which have completed the molt in late September and are in full feather and to hold those molting in October and November.

Soy Bean Meal for Hens Is Most Excellent Feed

A number of feeding tests at various experiment stations have shown the value of soy-bean oil meal as a poultry feed. From these tests it was concluded that soy bean oil meal could replace rolled oats in chick feeding. Poultrymen in the Pacific coast states have used soy-bean oil meal for several years and consider it a most excellent feed for growth and egg production.

Another series of experiments showed that soy-bean oil meal when fed with a suitable mineral mixture is a better supplement to corn meal than scraps and is nearly as good as condensed buttermilk when fed to chickens for short-time intensive feeding periods.

Way to Make Hens Sick

Feeding moldy cornmeal is rather a sure way of making hens sick. Spoiled feed will ruin either young chicks or ducklings in a short time. Always sort carefully any corn containing moldy or decayed ears and discard all that are not fit for food. Dogs can disgorge material that proves harmful to them but when a hen or chick eats spoiled grain or decayed meat it must pass through the entire digestive system and often it kills the bird.

Feed Value of Chess

There are no feeding tables giving the food analysis of chess. But it is safe to say that it has a fair feeding value. Many times it has been fed with satisfactory results. It is best to grind it and mix it with other grain. Chickens are shy about eating any new grain. If you bring your chicks up on wheat, and then suddenly change to corn, they will at first refuse to eat the corn, but in a short time they learn to eat the corn readily.

WORLD-WIDE sales of quality cars and trucks

General Motors cars and trucks are sold and serviced in 104 countries. The export shipments in 1925 amounted to 119,632 motor vehicles; and the overseas assembly plants and warehouses of General Motors now number 19. This vigorous development of the world-wide market for a complete line of quality cars is important to the car buyer. It is not only a contribution to international prosperity and progress, but it also helps to maintain the continuous production program at the factories, on which low prices depend.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 85

Constipation! How to Keep Bowels Regular

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated men, women, children, and particularly old folks, had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all headaches, biliousness, indigestion and stomach misery, he did not believe that a sickening "purge" or "physic" was necessary.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to establish natural bowel "regularity" even for those chronically constipated. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but, best of all, it never gripes, sickens, or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless, and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious, sick child gladly takes it.

THE NEWSPAPER OF YESTERDAY AND TODAY

News Reader Makes Analysis of News Matter of Modern Papers

The reader of newspapers, if he has passed the half century mark and is at all observant, will be impressed by the change of tone and purpose of present day publications, from the standards of those of his earlier recollections. Before advancing further with this article, in which comparisons are to be drawn, it may be pertinent, to inquire, what should be the purpose of a newspaper, it's aims, etc? Literature, like dress, is a reflection of customs, manners and modes of thought of people of that particular age; and, by comparison with the accumulated thought of the wisest of all ages, we are enabled to measure our progress or our retrogression. One of the most obvious, the most outstanding features, marking the change of the present from the past, is the departure from that dignity, solemnity, and high moral purpose, which characterized the earlier efforts of newspaper men.

Today, publishers, in common, with those of other avocations, seek to justify whatever may appear questionable, if not downright immoral, which appear in their columns, on the ground that it is news, and that the public demands news. They, like Pilate of old, seek to shift responsibility by engaging in that pastime, which, in vulgar parlance is termed, "Passing the buck." They seem to think people will forget, or rather, lack the perception to note that it was these same newspapers which insidiously, inserted the thin edge of the wedge, and gave them the first glimpse of indecency in printed form. Glance over the average daily of today, and what do you find? A record of crime; a nauseous mess regaling the activities of the so called elite, dished up in a manner calculated to appeal to all that is morbid in human kind. A philanderig Rudolph Valentino can draw more attention than the president of a university. This was demonstrated comparatively recently, when at the demise of two persons, at nearly the same time, the worthy Dr. Eliot of Harvard did not receive one hundredth of the notice that was accorded this, renegade, this sheik of filmdom, the "World's perfect lover;" Valentino. It is a sad commentary on American life, when people prefer froth to solids, and a condition to bid the thoughtful pause and take a mental inventory by asking themselves, "Whither are we drifting?"

And the thing we should remember, first of all, is this; this salatious, frothy and stinking mess that is offered you as mental food, is done at the instigation of a clique that has a sinister purpose in view, that being nothing more or less, than the desire to undermine the morale of our people, and the utter destruction of all that loyal patriotic Americans hold dear. Instead of being a moral force, that would tenaciously cling to the traditions, the vital principles that place us in a position, unique among the governments of the world; they are, many of them, pandering to the most vicious element under the specious plea of liberty. With publications openly sneerng at the Constitution, in part, at least, is it any wonder that the shallow headed sheiks of today, are boasting of laws they have broken, and that silly bedaubed and bobbed flappers, rebel at parental restraint, when their rediculous doings are recorded, and their thirst for notoriety is whetted by seeing pictures of their kind emblazoned on the front pages of our foreign controlled yellow journals?

The prize fight "pulled" at The Sesqui-Centennial between bruisers Dempsey and Tunney, were given as much space as a presidential inaugural. One might go on ad-infinitum, in presenting cases which show a trend of the newspaper fraternity of our greater cities, to play up the sordid, to cater to the neurotic morous, which marks the decadence of the newspaper in this, the fairest land sun ever shone upon. May the good sound sense of that decent Americanism save her, ere it it too late.

BEHOLD THE CRIMINAL

Recently, so the story runs in the publication "Safeguarding America Against Fire," while a forest fire raged about his house, a youth of Egg Harbor, New Jersey, sat in a rocking chair and played his ukulele, watching the blaze. Commanded by the Mayor to assist the fire fightrs, the boy only laughed, observed that fire fighting was not his business, and kept on strumming his instrument. He was arrested and fined ten dollars for disorderly conduct.

Suppose, says the Insurance Field, he had been a merchant, manufacturer or tenant permitting trash accumulations and other fire hazards, capable at any moment of setting off a great conflagration in a city—how much disorder could he be accused of?

Local Headquarters for the Famous Red Top STEEL FENCE POSTS

RIGHT here is the place to get those Red Top Steel Fence Posts you see advertised in your farm papers.

This Red Top is a proved post—tested by farmers in thousands of fence lines. It's got a mighty good record right around here. The studded Red Top is extra strong without a weak spot in it. It has a long life. You can drive over 200 of them in a day with the One-Man Driver. The Handy Fasteners that come free with the posts are made so as to hold the wire securely, thus doing away with restapling and restretching.

The Red Top post is guaranteed by the maker. Their guarantee is worth one hundred cents on the dollar. We are authorized to make all adjustments. So we put our own personal endorsement and guarantee on every Red Top we sell.

It's just that kind of an article we like to handle in all lines, the leader in its field. One of the main points we look at in our buying is to get the makes of goods that give our customers the most value for the money. We don't expect to prosper unless you get a good big dollar's worth for every dollar you spend.

Drop in and see us when you're in town. Prices are mighty reasonable just now on fencing materials and many other special items.

CONSIDERABLE COMMENT ON SPECIAL COLUMN

For the past two weeks, we have endeavored to create an interest in The News by inaugurating a news feature entitled, "We want to ask, do you remember?" Here we have tried to recall incidents of the past years that would revive only pleasant memories. We are asking for contributions from our readers and the more the merrier.

Old timers with a fondness for the past are invited to contribute "Do You Remembers." Names will not be used if not desired. Any by-gone event of St. Joe or Spencerville and vicinity is eligible. Address contributions to the "Do You Remember" editor of Weekly News, St. Joe, Ind.

Last week, Mrs. Wm. Randall called The News after reading the "Remember column." Speak- of remembering of the first automobile in St. Joe. One evening they heard a honk-honk about town and wondered whether it could be an automobile in town. The next morning their son, Harry, was over town and learned that the noise was not an automobile, but the stork that had left a boy at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Woodcoxthen living in the Buckingham property.

As others have perused these items week by week, they have, no doubt, had pleasant and interesting memories. Will you help us by sending in your Remembers?

MRS. MARY DILLS DIES AT AGE 68

St. Joe Resident Many Years Daughter of Pioneer Merchant

Mrs. Mary Dills, 68, did at her home at Hicksville Sunday, after an illness of several weeks.

Mrs. Dills has been a resident of Hicksville for many years, coming from the Dills farm between St. Joe and Spencerville, now owned by the Erick estate. She was a daughter of Samuel Olds, pioneer merchant of Spencerville.

Mrs. Dills is survived by one daughter, Mrs. O. V. Hart; three brothers Mort E. Olds, Quincy, Mich., Will J. Olds and Arthur B. Olds, Lagrange, Ind.; and two sisters, Mrs. Lena McClaren, Lima, Ohio and Mrs. Nellie Bishop, Indianapois.

GOES SOUTH FOR WINTER

Mrs. Sarah Widney, of Concord, left Monday for Sanford, Texas, where she will visit her son, Clarence and family and then go on to New Iberia, La., to be with her daughter, Miss Ida. In the spring she will return to her home again for the summer. Not many ladies of her age would start on a long journey alone, but her health is good and being used to traveling, she thinks nothing of the trip.

LOCAL SCHOOL ENTERTAINS NEWVILLE

Last Sunday was a big day for the Christian Sunday School and church, when they entertained the Newville school, who were winners in the contest that had been put on during the summer months. There were present 161. The meeting was of value in many ways, fellowship being emphasized.

The local school furnished the program following the Sunday School period, consisting of songs and readings and communion was observed. At the noon hour the tables were laden with chicken, cakes, salads, and all the necessary trimmings, and the visitors were certainly delighted with the wonderful layout.

It was necessary to have the tables filled twice in order to accomodate the crowd.

The afternoon meeting was on the order of a regular service with Rev. Boyts, of Auburn, making the address.

DEKALB COUNTY YOUTH SENTENCED TO REFORMATORY

Lester Keller of Wilmington township was given a sentence of two to fourteen years in the Indiana reformatory Saturday afternoon by Judge Endicott. He was also fined $10 and costs.

Keller who is a youth of eighteen years, had previously entered a plea of guilty to an affidavit charging him with assault and battery with intent to commit a felony. He confessed to mistreating eight year old Dorothy Keller of the same household, but no relation to him.

Parent-Teacher Association

The Parent-Teacher Association met last Thursday night and the excellent program was carried out as announced in last week's News. Each number received hearty applause.

In a carefully prepared address Mr. Ginther, representing the school patrons, gave a cordial welcome to our new teaching staff. He also made several suggestions which if acted upon would be beneficial. He spoke at length on three evils in our community namely, Deceit, Selfishness and Jealousy. He said, "When our new school building is completed let us for one day chain these evil enemies and have an all day get-together meeting in the new building. Let us have baskets with the very best of things to eat and let us have as our honored guests Co. Supt. and Mrs. Green, Trustee F. L. Milliman and Advisory Board Ed Schrader, Geo. F. Walter and M. D. Engle. For these are the people who by their sense of duty and progress have made possible our much needed new building."

This suggestion met with sincereapproval and there is no doubt but what the P.-T. A. will sponser just such a day.

The president, Ralph Sechler, appointed the following committees to lead in the work for this Program—Mrs. F. B. Leighty, Mrs. Hollis Dilley, Mr. C. Thomas.

INDIANA JUDGE TO JAIL ALL LIQUOR VIOLATORS

Smarting under criticism because he had given suspended sentences in liquor law violations cases, Judge Mishael Havran, of East Chicago, issued an ultimatum from the bench that all persons convicted of violating the liquor law would be sent to jail.

Ben Strong, sheriff, does not know where he will put them, as East Chicago police have made more than 400 raids since the first of the year and the city is a hotbed of liquor law violations.

WE WANT TO ASK DO YOU REMEMBER?

When Geo. and "Bill" Bleeks ran the first saw-mill here?

When Isaac Meese was the city drayman for several years?

When the Widney and Leighty orchards were first planted?

When Wash Woodcox owned a grocery store in the East end?

When Main street was almost impassible in muddy season?

When the ground occupied by the filling station was a public croquet ground?

When the John Hull barber shop was a black-smith shop, operated by A. LaChapelle?

When Mort E. Olds owned a general store and print shop on the site of the St. Joe Garage?

When the Ed. Leighty residence was part residence and part blacksmith shop owned by "Russ" Copp?

When a licensed saloon occupied the east room of Harry Hursh's grocery and dry goods store, while the west half was used by Laten Lake as a Bakery? The buildings were separate then, not joined as now.

DRAMATIC CLUB TO STAGE BENEFIT SHOW

A little over a year ago, when the new school building was assured, a committee of St. Joe citizens with Wm. Curie as chairman, purchased 450 operachairs from the Butler Opera House. Before making the purchase the committee asked the St. Joe Dramatic Club if they would put on a benefit play for this purpose. The Club pledged support. When these chairs are instaled a payment is necessary at once and so it is arranged that the first entertainment in the new building will be a play from the Dramatic Club and all of the proceeds will be used on the debt of the chairs.

HAS BECOME A VERY NOTED AGRICULTURIST

S. S. Widney heads all record as an agriculturist of the first degree. While his special hobby is raising novelty produce, yet he does it in a scientific way. His latest and best production is the wonderful "Guinea Bean," measuring 4 feet and 1 inch in length and weighing approximately 12 pounds. Those who saw the bean growing were amazed at its size while others who seen it on display in the Notary's office were emphatic in their belief that it was a gourd. In spite of what folks said, S. S. still contends that it is a bean and he has just as much right to his belief as any other person, or perhaps more, because he ate part of one. Anyway it was a real freak.

Ideal VECTO Heater

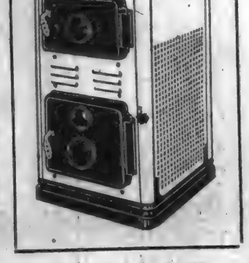
BETTER Warmth with GREATER Economy

For Solid Comfort, Health, and the Utmost in Economy

DO you want your little home to be a place of cheer and comfort? Clean to live in and safe and healthful for the children? Do you want it to be snug and warm in every nook, and at the same time have the pleasure of knowing that you are actually saving money on your coal bills?

It is all within your reach.

A compact, self-contained, beautiful heating unit has been perfected which warms, not one room, but a whole home—and yet consumes only as much coal, or less, than is now used by old-fashioned methods to heat one room! This is the Ideal Vecto Heater.



Its warmth is clean and healthful. It requires no basement for installation; it is an ornament in any room. For more or less heat, you need but turn a handle. Compact and selfcontained, it may be moved like furniture. It burns either coal or wood, and will serve you faithfully and efficiently during your lifetime. The price of the Ideal Vecto Heater is very low; and you can enjoy its warmth and comfort while it is helping to pay for itself by its economy in fuel consumption. This truly wonderful Heater has been developed in our Institute of Thermal Research, the largest heating laboratory in the world.

Lesson for October 24

JOSHUA, ISRAEL'S NEW LEADER

LESSON TEXT—Num. 27:18-20; Joshua 1:1-9.

GOLDEN TEXT—Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord, thy God is with thee withersoever thou goest.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Joshua the New Leader.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Task of Joshua.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Secret of a Strong and Useful Life.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Preparation for True Service.

The book of Joshua, from which our lesson is taken, is a history of the conquest of the promised land and its division among the tribes of Israel. It takes its name from its principal character, Joshua.

I. Joshua, the New Leader of Israel (Num. 27:18-20).

The people were not to be left in doubt as to a leader when Moses was gone. The leader was to be appointed and given recognition before all the congregation.

During the wilderness journey Joshua was Moses' minister and the captain of his army. When Moses was denied the privilege of going over the Jordan, Joshua was appointed to the leadership of Israel. Moses, the representative of the law, brought Israel to the borders of Canaan. Joshua was the man chosen to lead the people into the place of rest. The name "Joshua" has the same derivation as the name "Jesus."

II. Joshua Commanded to Take Charge (Josh. 1:2).

Moses was dead, but God's work must go on, therefore God issued the command for the new leader to assume his duty.

III. God Renews His Promise to Israel Concerning the Land (Josh. 1:3, 4).

This promise had been given to Abraham and renewed to Isaac, Jacob and Moses. It is now renewed to Israel as they were about to enter upon its possession. The borders of the land were "from the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the River Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun." The nearest this territory was ever possessed was during the reign of David and Solomon, though not then fully realized. This land still belongs to the Jews, and in God's own time they shall possess it. Their possession of this land was due entirely to themselves. God promised them that wherever their feet stood upon the land it was theirs.

IV. God's Presence Promised (Josh. 1:5).

Joshua was entering upon a perilous and difficult enterprise, but the Lord said as He was with Moses, so He would be with him. The difficulties before him were:

1. The Jordan river (v. 2).

This river was now at its flood (Josh. 3:15), making it impossible for armies to cross.

2. The people were living in walled cities (Num. 13:28).

Notwithstanding this, God was ready to insure success.

(1) "I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (v. 5).

(2) "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee."

(3) "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee." Joshua had been with Moses throughout their forty years' experience from the Egyptian deliverance to the time of his death. Because he believed that God was with his master, he was willing and ready to cross the Jordan at its floodtide and courageously meet the enemies on the other side.

V. Conditions of Blessing in the Land (Josh. 1:6-9).

1. "Be strong and of good courage" (v. 6).

His mission was to go in and divide the land among the tribes for an inheritance. It required strength and courage to do this.

2. "Unwavering obedience to the Word of God (v. 7).

In a land of idolatry it required much courage to be true to God. Prosperity and success were conditioned upon unswerving obedience to God's commands. In all his work he must conform his life to the law of God. To pass from the path outlined therein would bring disaster and ruin. In order to accomplish this the law of the Lord must be in his mouth continually. He was to meditate therein day and night.

Joshua rendered prompt obedience, he did not stop to cavil, but at once gave order for the march. God made the plan and gave the directions.

Suffering From Headaches, Indigestion, Kidney Trouble and Nervousness, Recovers Health. Thanks Tanlac

When Mrs. Essie Reed Ray, 1119 W. Indiana St., Evansville, Ind., was still in her twenties she found herself on the verge of becoming an invalid—unable to eat without suffering from indigestion and gastritis, too weak to do her housework.

Mrs. Ray says: "Days of anguish and pain that I tried to hide with a smile, followed sleepless nights caused by pains in my back and stomach. The sight of food nauseated me. I ate little and became weak, run-down.

"My body needed help, a strength-giving tonic. I tried everything for relief. Then a friend told me about Tanlac.

"Soon after taking Tanlac I began to sleep better and get up in the morning refreshed. I took on weight and felt stronger. Glorious health has brought me happiness."

Benefit by Mrs. Ray's experience. Let this marvelous tonic made from roots, barks and herbs according to the famous Tanlac formula, help rebuild your run-down body, drive out pain and poison, give you health. Results after taking the first bottle will amaze you. Ask your druggist for Tanlac—today! Over 40 million bottles sold.

Tie That Slipped

There was an imposing wedding at the Book-Cadillac, with all the men in top hats and the bridesmaids in glittering finery. The entry to the hotel was impressive—except that the groom's new gray tie slipped its moorings and climbed up to his ears and for every comment on the bride's beauty there were 20 on the groom's neckie.—Detroit News.

The bridge rocked and swayed to their struggle, bucking under them as the flood lifted it, only to let it sag again, and swirled about their feet, tugging viciously at the structure, tearing at the cables, thrusting at the cliffs. Their feet slipped on the wet planks, they fell against the hand-rope and the slanting suspension stays, clutching frantically with one hand, striking with the other, giving blows that left each sick with pain, desperate, ignoring the peril, clinging and sliding while they fought, silent save for their heavy breathing and the grunts with which a blow was delivered or received.

Baxter fought foul as his strength sapped from him. Caleb was harder, deeper-lunged, better muscled for this rough and tumble game. He hammered Baxter over the kidneys and Baxter gasped with the pain, his face contorting while he hung like a dead weight to his opponent, faint with anguish. When it passed he flung up his knee and caught Caleb in the groin, temporarily evening things. He broke free and lashed out, right and left, flailing at Caleb's head and jaw as the latter crouched against an angle of the hand rope and a stay, covering up. Then, with an energy summoned from his reserves, Caleb rushed, landing hard above the heart. Baxter staggered, groped forward and flung an arm about Caleb's neck, dragging with all his weight while Baxter strove for balance. His fingers found Caleb's throat, and worked desperately in shutting off breath, torturing as they pressed upon the jugular.

As they clung, athwart the planks now, Baxter's weight almost unbearable in the crook of Caleb's arm, his body stretched out down stream with the force of the water, the eastern buttress shuddered, tottered, slid: plunging into the gut. It toppled sideways, shaking the bridge as a terrier shakes a rat, dragging it until the cables sang above the noise of the torrent and then, anchored by sunken ledge and crevice, jammed hard, it held firm, the cables still secure. The sudden jar, the lowered pitch, was too much for Baxter. The blow over the heart had finished his endurance. His fingers lost their grip on Caleb's throat, the furious water claimed him. His despairing clutch on Caleb's smooth slicker failed. He gave a cry, his face ghastly in the white light of the moon and slid into the current like a hog.

Caleb snatched him by the collar of his coat and shifted his armhold for a grip on a saving stanchion as they both straightened out in the imperious sweep of the maddened creek. He thought his arm would be torn from its socket with the strain and he managed to wrap his legs about the planks, shouting at Baxter, yelling his loudest. Unless Baxter helped to save himself, or Caleb let loose of him, another moment would see them both whirled down the gut, over and over, their lungs filled with water, battered, drowned!

"Get hold of yourself," Caleb yelled. "Baxter! Get a grip on something, hang on to me. Haul yourself up. Quick!"

The insistent words and the will behind them worked in Baxter's numb brain and roused him to a last flurrying fight for life. With a frantic effort he clawed at Caleb, twining his fingers in the slicker and slowly dragged himself up from the suction of the flood. Caleb got both hands to the stanchion, praying that it might hold. Baxter found the opposite one, then the hand-rope, and so crawled to safety, releasing Caleb from his dead weight. He began to hitch himself up the incline while Caleb lay for the moment slack, utterly exhausted, his breath coming in great gasps, the fibers of his muscles seeming to be torn apart, his sinews racked. He got to his knees at last and then to his feet. The bridge might collapse at any second, there was no time to lose. Baxter collapsed again from weakness, face down on the planks where they still showed above the ever-rising, furious water.

Caleb got an arm about him. With the help of the hand-rope he hauled Baxter along until they reached the solid cliff of the western side of the gut. The blood was pounding in his brain with his efforts and it seemed as if someone was calling to him. He stood, leaning against a tree—Baxter seated on a ledge, his face in his hands, elbows on knees—and faced the creek and the broken bridge, breathing in great gulps of cool air. The call came plainly now, no fiction of his dizzy brain.

Reined upon the verge where the cliff buttress had broken loose, was Betty Clinton on her pinto pony, the forelegs of the snorting horse braced against danger. The moon was free of scud and the girl's face was clearly visible. She had no hat and her chestnut hair was in disorder.

"How long had she been there?" Caleb wondered while he strove to catch what she was saying above the tumult of the creek. He heard his name. She recognised him, with his slicker torn, his face bloody. And she had hailed him in preference to Baxter! Baxter had come from the ranch. Yes, she had called to the man she had snubbed—in her trouble, for there was trouble, he gathered, as she repeated her words in a high voice that came clearly now and then when wind and water favored.

"Mr. Warner! My father—is—ill! I have—sent—word—by Padilla—by the road. A doctor—Luis—may—not—get one. Will—you? The bridge!"

"I'll get one," Caleb shouted back. She heard him and nodded to tell him so. He turned to Baxter.

"Hear what she said? I've got to get a doctor. Are you all right to leave?" Baxter lifted his face. It was sullen with hate.

"D—n you, yes," he answered. "Leave me alone."

Caleb looked across the gut before he took to the trail. He saw Betty Clinton deftly wheeling her pony. It was dark as soon as he got well into the canyon where the growth was thick. But he forged ahead in the darkness, puzzling a little as to why she had not called Baxter. Had she ridden to overtake him, knowing he had gone that way. Had she seen the fight, seen Caleb rescue his opponent, perhaps thought Baxter too weak for her purpose—or did she take sides with Caleb, in some flash of intuition?

Whatever the real reason, his hopes spurred him down the uncertain path on his errand, charged with new energy by the appeal of Betty Clinton. He came out upon the plain panting but with his second wind gained, crunching through gravel, plowing through the alkali soil at a steady jog until at last he pounded over the Coyote creek bridge and gained the hotel, asking the astonished landlord where the nearest doctor lived, and so on again down the road for half a mile to find the physician in and commandeer his services.

"Clinton? Clinton of El Nido? Have you come from there? What's the trouble?"

"I can't tell you. Not an accident, I'm sure, or Miss Clinton would have said so. The bridge at the canyon head was down. We had to shout across. She's sent a man by the road but she was afraid he might not be able to get a doctor. She just said he was ill."

"Ah! I see. He'll have gone to Paloma. There's Conklin there. And he's got a lot of influence. Road's pretty bad after the storm, but we'll get there. Going back with me?"

Caleb wanted to go back. He might be of use. He had done what she asked, he was entitled to her thanks, at least.

"I'll go," he said.

"Come on." The doctor had picked up his bag and led the way to his little garage.

The sky had cleared completely and the night was fair as they chugged out to the road and shot down toward the highway that would take them to Paloma and so, by a sideroad, to the valley. Caleb fancied that Baxter would come out of the canyon all right. Not that he greatly cared. But some of the enmity had gone out of him.

The air was cool, bright stars glittered all about the soaring moon. Only the rutted road showed that there had been a storm. At last they struck the well-drained highway and sped along the metaled road at top speed, past the scattering light of Paloma to labor valiantly up the hill that led to Hermanos valley and drop down to the ranch.

There was a car standing by the house.

"Looks as if they'd got Conklin," said the doctor as he honked his horn and braked to a standstill. "Don't look like his car, though."

It was Baxter's roadster. Why he should have left it there and started for the canyon in the storm, again perplexed Caleb. A sudden thought struck him with the possibility that he might have quarreled with Betty Clinton. That would account for her not asking his aid. He had lied when he said he kissed her. Baxter would do that. Or the kiss might have been forced, and he dismissed.

A door opened. Betty Clinton appeared, her voice anxious.

"You've come at last. What is it?"

They were getting out of the car, the doctor reaching back for his bag.

"It is Warner, Miss Clinton. I've brought Doctor . . . ?"

"Doctor Kennedy, Miss Clinton."

"Oh!" There was relief in her tone. "I'm so glad you've come. He's in a high fever. I'm afraid . . ."

Caleb followed them as they walked swiftly toward the open door. She had thanked him only by a glance that held its reward and conveyed something that encouraged him to wait in the big living-room. There might be something else that he could do. He still puzzled over the presence of Baxter's machine outside, the riddle of Baxter, walking down the canyon. It all seemed to point to a quarrel. Mary Morgan's suggestion that Betty Clinton had not believed him as bad as he was painted grew more likely, this service that he had rendered her might help to renew the bond between them.

He was still in the dark as to the nature of Clinton's illness, or its seriousness, and no one came to enlighten him until the honk of a horn sounded outside.

Betty Clinton did not answer this arrival. Instead Maria entered from the patio pergola, ushering in a brisk, short man with a bag.

"I'm Doctor Conklin," said the man to Caleb who had risen. "You are a friend of the family? I don't think I've met you before."

"I brought Doctor Kennedy up from Coyote," said Caleb. "Miss Clinton feared Padilla might not be able to secure you. It is too bad that there is not a telephone here or we might have saved you the trip. I understand you have plenty to do in Paloma."

The doctor did not appear aggrieved that he had come to play second fiddle, that he might not be wanted.

"Kennedy, eh? Good man, Kennedy! Yes, we have a mild epidemic. I must be going back as soon as possible. But there's no harm done. The Mexican told me about Clinton. Exposure—low vitality—danger of pneumonia."

Maria came back and went into the patio. Her eyes turned toward Caleb. He fancied them friendly. Betty Clinton was close behind her.

"I am so glad you came, doctor," she said, advancing with outstretched hand. "So is Doctor Kennedy. He wants to consult with you. Will you go in?"

She accompanied him to the inner door and then came back to Caleb. Her face was pale and worried but her eyes were shining as she gave him her hand.

"I haven't thanked you yet," she said. "There isn't time just now. But I appreciate what you have done. It was—kind. You can wait?"

"Surely," he answered, stirred by her touch and voice. She had barely disappeared when Maria arrived with coffee and sandwiches that she set on a table.

"La senorita wishes you to eat," she said, with the effect of an absolute order. Caleb thanked her.

"Did you see—that other one?" she asked. "My senorita did not say, save that she met you by the bridge."

WORK CENTER HANDY IN MAKING PASTRY

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A marble top from an old bureau, and convenient shelves for storing supplies, especially those needed for making biscuits or pies, may be seen in this section of a Virginia farm kitchen. The photograph was taken by the United States Department of Agriculture. When it is also possible to have a high stool to sit on while at work the homemaker reduces fatigue noticeably and so gets more done. The cold marble is excellent for chilling and rolling out the dough, and is easily cleaned.

YEAST ROLLS ARE EASILY PREPARED

Temperature of Dough Important at All Stages.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Yeast rolls are made by the same general method as loaf bread. They usually contain more sugar and shortening and sometimes egg, and milk is almost always used as the liquid. If sugar and shortening are increased, they tend to retard the growth of the yeast and the rolls take longer to rise. If desired, rolls may be made from bread dough by adding the extra sugar and shortening when the dough is ready to be punched down the first time. In this case, of course, more kneading is required in order to combine the materials thoroughly and it may be necessary to knead in more flour.

The temperature of the dough is important at all stages of preparing yeast bread and rolls. The illustration shows the use of a thermometer to test the temperature of the dough at different times during the processes of kneading, rising, and punching down.

The straight dough method of mixing and handling the dough within a period of about four hours is perhaps the most convenient when only rolls are made. Details of this method are given in Farmers' Bulletin 1450-F, "Home Baking." Allow the dough to rise the first time in the same way as for loaf bread. The dough may be permitted to rise again before it is shaped into biscuits, or the second rising of the dough may be omitted. Roll the dough out thin and cut with a biscuit cutter, or cut off small pieces from the dough, roll them into balls, and flatten with the palms of the hands. Brush the top part lightly with butter, crease through the center with the handle of a tableknife, fold over, and press down the top.

After rolls are molded and placed in the pan, they may be put in a refrigerator or other cold place to slow down the action of the yeast, and baked later. If the temperature has been so low that the rising is very much checked, they should be kept in a warm place for a little while before baking so that the volume will be about doubled.

Parkerhouse Rolls.

1 cupful milk	1 tablespoonful sugar
1 cake (⅛ ounce) yeast	About 3¼ cupfuls sifted hard-wheat flour, or 4 cupfuls sifted soft-wheat flour
1½ tablespoonfuls butter or other fat
1½ tablespoonfuls salt

When the rolls have doubled in bulk for the last time, bake them quickly in a hot oven 425 degrees Fahrenheit for 10 or 15 minutes.

RECIPE TO MAKE GOOD BEAN SOUP

Same General Directions Apply to Various Kinds.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The same general directions apply to any kind of bean soup, or to soup made from dried peas, which may be used if more convenient. They come from the same plant family, and supply about the same food materials. Naturally you are familiar with the white navy bean and dried lima beans. Red kidney beans are very good, too, and there are many others, some of them well known locally in various parts of the country, but little used elsewhere. There is the pinto, or frijol bean, mottled brown and white, abundant in the Southwest; the black or turtle soup bean, the flageolet or French lima, and the soy bean, which was introduced from the Orient. The cowpea is used in large quantities in the South, and is of the same character as these other beans, though a little different in flavor. These last two require longer preliminary soaking and longer cooking than the other varieties, so perhaps one of the first four or five should be chosen.

For a family of six half a pint of the dried beans will be sufficient for the soup. They should be soaked overnight in four times as much water, or one quart, and then cooked in the same water until very soft. If you like the flavor of onion, cook one or two slices with the beans. If you have a fireless cooker you will find it excellent for cooking them. Mash the beans through a sieve when they are done, and add water and milk, or stock—enough to make up a full quart. Of course you may prepare a double quantity of bean soup and serve it twice if you like, suggests the United States Department of Agriculture.

All bean or pea soups should have a little flour added to them as a binder to prevent the thick part from settling to the bottom. Mix a tablespoonful of butter with a tablespoonful of flour. Add a little of the hot soup, and stir until it is smooth. Then add the remaining soup and salt and pepper to season. Cook in the double boiler about ten minutes. Celery or any other soup vegetables you wish may be cooked with the soup. They should be cut up in small pieces. A tablespoonful of chopped parsley sprinkled over the soup at the last minute is an agreeable addition. A pinch of mustard and a little lemon juice are good when black beans are used.

Acid Solution Will Keep Kettle Free of Deposits

The hard deposits in tea kettles consist of calcium sulphate, commonly called gypsum, carbonate of calcium and magnesium, known as dolomitic limestone or a mixture of these two substances together with small amounts of silica and oxides of iron and alumina.

If the deposit is not too heavy, it can be removed with a hot solution of vinegar or commercial muriatic acid, one part of which has been diluted with five parts of water. The acid solution should be handled carefully, as it is corrosive. Frequent applications will keep the kettle free from deposits. If the deposit is allowed to become thick and hard, there is no practical method of removing it.

Bulletins on Home Economics

You can get bulletins on foods and nutrition and various other home economics topics free by writing to the Office of Publications, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. The free supplies of bulletins become exhausted occasionally, however, and then it is generally possible to buy a copy of the bulletin desired from the superintendent of documents of the government printing office for a nominal sum, generally 5 or 10 cents.

Fighting Smallpox in Central Africa

Smallpox is a terrible plague when it breaks out, as it does, among the native in Central Africa. There is one small woman over there, Miss Tessie Williams (who recently visited the United Christian Missionary society's headquarters here, being employed by this board), who is doing her best to make Africa smallpox-proof. She vaccinated 646 natives in one day, considering it a very good missionary stunt. Her method of describing it was like the assembling of fabulous numbers of autos as witnessed in a well known factory. They stood in a line an eighth of a mile long. One native administered the soapsuds, scrubbing the arm clean; another scraped the skin, ready for the inoculation; a third kept the young missionary supplied with apparatus. Nothing but sleeveless costumes are worn in that part of Africa, and, despite the hurry of it, there were no infections or other ill effects.—Detroit Free Press.

Seasoned Knowledge

Talk about those subjects you have had long in your mind, and listen to what others say about subjects you have studied but recently. Knowledge and timber shouldn't be much used until they are seasoned.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

THIS WOMAN'S BATTLE

Wins Against Ill Health

"At times I was hardly able to do my housework," writes Mrs. Margaret Wallace of 1547 Safford Ave., Columbus, Ohio. How many women have found themselves in this same condition! How many women have fought bravely on day after day, cooking, washing, ironing, doing the dishes, and keeping the house clean, when they were in a weakened condition and had not sufficient strength to perform these duties easily and properly!

When Mrs. Wallace was experiencing great difficulty in carrying on the daily tasks, a friend advised her to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and she gave it a fair trial. "I just can't give enough thanks to it," she writes. "Now I can eat anything at all and I am feeling better than I have for years. I shall never be without your medicine again."

A woman who is fighting for her health and her family's happiness is a valiant soldier. She wages her battle in her own kitchen. She has no thrilling bugles to cheer her on, no waving banners.

Many other women tell us, as Mrs. Wallace did, that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound was their faithful ally in the struggle for better health.

TAX RATES IN COUNTY COMPLETED

Valuable Information Given Here Concerning Tax For Another Year

Waterloo again takes the lead with the highest tax rate among the towns and cities of DeKalb county, with $3.76 on the $100 valuation for the year 1927.

Butler city is next with $2.95, according to reports from all the taxing units received by County Auditor, Frank Shook. The lowest rate among the towns is Altona, with $2.01.

The only town with the same rate for 1927 as for 1926 is Corunna. The greatest increase is that of St. Joe, which is 46 cents. Auburn is 10 cents higher, Butler city 8 cents higher and Ashley 3 cents higher.

Garrett takes the lead in reductions, with a cut of 35 cents. The Altona rate is reduced 13 cents and the Waterloo rate 5 cents.

Spencer, with $2.24, has the highest rate for 1927 among the townships. Stafford, with $1.24, has the lowest.

Newville shows the greatest increase, jumping 63 cents. Spencer is 48 cents higher, Concord 24 cents, Buter and Fairfield each 9 cents and Troy 5 cents.

Jackson township has a reduction of 19 cents, Franklin and Grant each 11 cents, Union 7, Stafford 4, Smithfield 3, Keyser 2 and Wilmington and Richland each 1 cent.

Shirt with the BUTTONS OFF Is Annoying

But:—

You don't throw the shirt away. You have the buttons sewed on and the shirt is as good as ever.

Just so with your automobile. Its parts are probably worn, but it's not worn out. All it needs is reconditioning. Motors are bound to wear, just the same as tires. And motors wear means loss of money in gas and oil and loss of convenience and pleasure.

We can put your car in first-class shape by reconditioning the motor; installing and adjusting the necessary parts.

And we'll tell you how much it'll cost before we do the job. Its moderation will surprise you.

BOY RUN OVER BY GRAVEL TRUCK

An unavoidable accident occurred Friday evening, when Harold Goldsmith, 12, son of Mr. and Mrs. Sol Goldsmith, living just north of the Spencerville school house, was run over by a gravel truck driven by G. R. Lynn, of St. Joe, resultingin two ribs being broken besides the boy being badly bruised.

Harold was on his way home from school and riding on the reach of Ray Means wagon. When he neared home he jumped off and started in the drive way, not looking for passing machines and he walked out in front of the truck. Mr. Lynn states that it was so unexpected that he could not stop, although he called to the boy.

When stopped the boy was picked up unconscious and taken to the house. It was thought at first that he was serious but later developments at the hospital proved not so. Tuesday evening he was brought home in the Kinsey ambulance and is improving nicely.

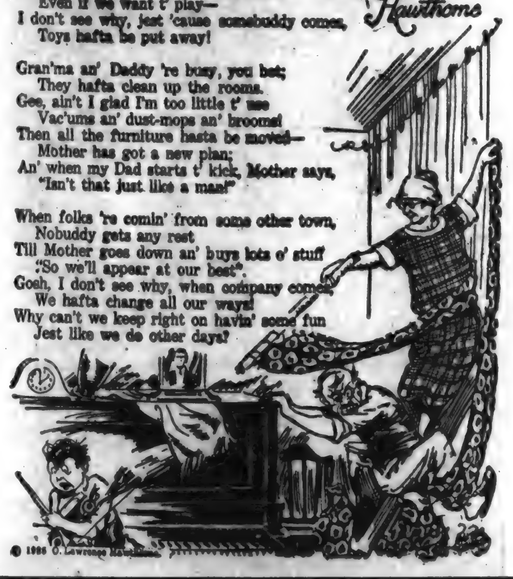
When Company Comes

by Lawrence Hawthorne



Jest before company comes t' our house,
Gee, but we're busy, all right!
Mother keeps everyone jumpin' around
Gettin' things put out o' sight.
All of us kids hafta pick up our toys,
Even if we want t' play—
I don't see why, jest 'cause somebuddy comes,
Toys hafta be put away!

Gran'ma an' Daddy 're busy, you bet;
They hafta clean up the rooms.
Gee, ain't I glad I'm too little t' see
Vac'ums an' dust-mops an' brooms!
Then all the furniture hasta be moved—
Mother has got a new plan;
An' when my Dad starts t' kick, Mother says,
"Isn't that just like a man!"

When folks 're comin' from some other town,
Nobuddy gets any rest
Till Mother goes down an' buys lots o' stuff
"So we'll appear at our best".
Gosh, I don't see why, when company comes,
We hafta change all our ways!
Why can't we keep right on havin' some fun
Jest like we do other days?

MISS TRESSA NEWMAN BRIDE OF RALPH ZIMMERMAN

Miss Tressa Newman, daughter of Water Newman, of South Cowen street, was united in marriage at the Christian church parsonage by the Rev. D. G. Holman to Ralph Zimmerman, son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Zimmerman of South Peters street, Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Miss Cletus McKinley acted as bridesmaid and Donald Sell as best man. The couple will make their home with the bride's father for the present. Mr. Zimmerman has been employed for the past three years with his father in the stuccoing and plastering business. —Garrett Clipper.

Miss Newman will be remembered by Spencerville readers as the grand-daughter of Mrs. Arline Rhoades. She has a wide acquaintance here and all join in extending congratulations.

15,551 NAMES ON REGISTRATION BOARD'S LISTS

The number of qualified voters in DeKalb county according to the figures compiled by the registration board is 15,551. The number of votes cast two years ago was 11,158.

Of the number shown to be qualified, 4,004 are new registrations and the balance, 11,547, are registered by having voted two years ago.

The registration board, composed of County Auditor Frank Shook and Mrs. Frank Brandon, completed its work and the registration records are now ready for the precinct election boards.

Mr. Shook states that a considerable number of names of voters are duplicated on the registration records. A citizen who voted in 1924 and who moved and registered before the board now has his name in two precincts.

FIRST HUNTING ACCIDENT

The first hunting tragedy of the season in Noble county occurred at the A. H. Smith farm, near Ligonier, late Wednesday aftrenoon, when Hugh Hamilton, 28, of Elkhart, was instantly killed. He was attempting to crawl over a wire fence at the Smith barnyard whn his double barreled shotgun was accidently discharged, the charge nearly blowing off the victim's head. Hamilton and his companion were just starting for home after a day's hunt when the tragedy occurred.

CONGRESSMAN HOGG WAGES ACTIVE CAMPAIGN

(Special to St. Joe News)

Fort Wayne, Ind., Oct. 19, 1926. Congressman David Hogg for the past ten days has been addressing two or three political metings each day in addition to speaking under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. at the large factorieshere. Contrary to many speakers hee always invites questions from the audience and never fails to give the questioner all time necessary to explain his position or to reply to Mr. Hogg's answer.

The political promises of Mr. Hogg made two years ago compared with what he helped to do in the first session has aroused much discussion everywhere. Thus far several congressmen have come to the Twelfth District to testify to the high standing of David Hogg among his colleagues in Washington.

For a new member to secure the passage of nine special bills, to be elected to the membership of a mojor committee, to be absent from his duties in the house of representatives only one day in the first session is a record which is seldom equalled.

Congressman Hogg gives special atention to compensation and pension cases. He has always gone out of his way to be of service to the people of the Twelfth District.

In his addresses Mr. Hogg emphasizes the necessity of checking foreign immigration, the danger of the World Court to the welfare of America and the benefits of the Protective Tariff to agriculture and to the wage earner.

Corn Borer Demonstration

A demonstration on the harvesting of corn under European corn borer conditions was held at the Erick farm, one mile south of St. Joe, Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock. The demonstration was conducted by Frank Wallace, state entomologist, and P. T. Ulman, a deputy state entomologist.

About 200 farmers and interested persons were present to see the workings of the corn binder, how low cutting would keep the borer in check and also the use of plow in turning under stalks. The farmers were well pleased with the work.

Becides the federal and state men, Purdue was represented, County Agents, Vocational teachers and students took advantage of the demonstration.

REPUBLICAN EDITORS CRITICISE ADAMS

Indianapois, Ind., Oct. 20.—Indiana Republican editors went on rcord today as criticising the so-caled Adams probe. In a statement issued to the press, the editors said the activities of Thomas H. Adams, Vincennes publisher, were never authorized by the Indiana Republican Editorial Association, and regret was expressed that the name of Indiana has been blackened by the unsupported statements of criminals and men with criminal records who have been supplying information to Adams on which the alleged probe had its foundation.

A majority of the officers of the editorial association signed the statemnt as well as the members of the Inter-Relations Committe. The editors expressed complete confidence in Clyde A. Walb, Republican State Chairman, and the entire Repubican National and State tickets. The statement of the editors follows:

"At a meeting held Monday, October 18th, at Indianapolis, Indiana, a unmber of the members of the Indiana Republican Editorial Association at which a majority of the officers present, presided over by James J. Patchell, First Vice-President of the Association, authorized the following statement

'In view of telegrams received Saturday, October 16, from Will O. Seudner, Secretary of the Indiana Republican Editorial Association, demanding the resignation of Clyde A. Walb, as Chairman of the State Republican Centra Committee, and the false light in which the Editorial Association has been placed by reason of untruthful and libelous statements purporting to come from a so-called probe committee headed by Thomas H. Adams, of Vincennes, a member of this association, we feel that the time has come when some action should be taken by members of this association in order that the voters of the state may know the actual facts.

'In the first place the Indiana Republican Editorial Association never at any time nor does it now approve of a probe, prompted by a desire on the part of Mr. Adams and Mr. Feudner to seek revenge for alleged personal grievances in which the Association is not in any way interested.

'In the second place Mr. Adams and Mr.Feudner were never authorized by the Association to conduct this so-called probe and so far as the majority of the officers and members know no such committee was ever officially appointed and does not represent this Association.

'We have the utmost confidence in Mr. Walb and members of the State Republican Central Committee, and all the candidates on the Republican National and State ticket and we deeply deplore and regret the ill-advised action of the Secretary in sending telegrams in an effort to prevent members of the Association from attending the regular meeting of the StateCommittee. Mr. Fuedner acted without authority and we regard the telegram an insult to every member of the Association and an attempt on Mr. Feudner's part to control the actions of the members of the Association and dictate as to when, where and with whom the members of this Association should meet.

'Inasmuch as Mr. Adams has seen fit to accept the word of convicts and ex-convicts and take up the cause of Mr. Stephenson and has issued statement after statementreflecting unfavorably on the character and reputation of certain public officials, we heartily approv of the thorough investigation now being made by the Marion County Grand Jury as conducted by Arthur L. Gilliom, Attorney General of the state, and William H. Remy, Prosecuting Attorney of Marion County.' "

State Senator Lowell B. Mason, "dry" candidate for re-election from Oak Park, Ill., has been indicted by the federal grand jury along with a former prohibition director and six other members of an alleged sacramental wine syndicate. Mason is accused of being the payoff link in $1,000,000 graft.

LORGNETTES FOR ARMY

Lorgnettes, once the prerogative of nice but nearsighted ladies, have been added to the standard equipment of the engineer corps of the army. The idea is to furnish a stereoscopic lorgnette, practical rather than ornamental, through which the engineer officers can quickly read aerial maps, photographs and drawings. Photograph shows Lieut. J. M. Young using one of the lorgnettes.

His Idea

A certain family on Broadway was taking care of a canary bird for one of its neighbors. The young son of the family noticed that the bird was losing a tail feather. He called and said, "Oh, daddy! Cheepy is losing a feather out of his tail."

His father replied, "That is just a shingle off his roof."

Immediately the little fellow looked back at the bird and retorted, "Well, I'll say it is off his back porch."—Indianapolis News.

Troublesome "Corridor"

The so-called Danzig corridor is a narrow strip of country extending across Germany to the Baltic sea just west of Danzig. It gives Poland an outlet to the sea. THREE DAY COLDS THREATEN LUNGS

A cough or cold that hangs on after the third day is a threat.

Do something! Don't wait until it has run its course—from your head to your throat, chest and bronchial tubes. When you feel a cough or cold spreading down into the bronchial tubes it is in the "danger zone"—for these tubes lead directly into your lungs.

Quickly and unfailingly Ayer's Cherry Pectoral goes straight to the seat of the trouble. Real medicine, reaching deep down with its soothing, healing power. Absorbed through and through the irritated throat, chest and bronchial membranes, it quickly stops the cough, breaks up the cold and brings prompt, lasting relief.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is hospital-proved and prescribed by physicians. Pleasant to taste. All druggists—60c and, twice the quantity, $1.00.

POCKETS ADORN FALL FROCKS; STYLE IN SILKEN NELIGEE

THAT note of embellishment which the present-day mode evidently regards as essential for even the simple daytime frock must find placement somewhere, and that "somewhere" happens at this moment to be pockets and sleeves. Since this competition for decorative charm has become so keen between pocket and sleeve, creative genius is artfully contriving to give each a chance to win.

The very attractive satin frock in this picture typifies the trend of fashion toward whimsical pockets and sleeves. The stylist lavishly embroiders both pockets and sleeves in gold and silver tinsel, for metal stitchery, either hand or machine, is an outstanding feature throughout all fashioning this season. The sleeves in this handsome daytime dress accent cunningly disposed puffs caught into bands with wrist ties. The pockets claim a useful as well as ornamental purpose in that they cleverly hold in place group-plaits whereby modish skirt fullness is achieved. The idea in using a contrasting color trim is everywhere exploited. For this model the designer uses cinnamon-colored crepe for collar and sleeve puffs.

A Very Attractive Satin Frock.

As to favored materials satin, twill and wool jersey cloth give pleasing variety to daytime dresses. Touches of embroidery or metal trimming give a delightful accent to schoolgirl modes. Plaits are much in evidence, of same is but one of hosts of dresses worked out from the combination-of-fabric standpoint. Fanciful belts are another important element which enters into the creation of the new autumn frocks.

Modernists who are urging a more feminized or more seductive styling of woman's apparel find their fondest hopes realized in the exquisite negligee which milady will wear this autumn and winter within the environs of home. One may choose to appear strictly tailored or conservatively frocked on avenue or boulevard, but within the quiet of one's boudoir indulgence in frills and furbelows is to be expected.

Formal pajama sets and picturesque negligees are competing for supremacy. In so doing they have established a new record for elaborateness wherein there is much gorgeousness of color, elegance of fabric, the same enhanced with wondrous handiwork, gold and silver trimmings, silken fringes and rare laces.

The lovely negligee in the picture is designed for that charming actress, Alice Terry, and it is eminently suited to her style of beauty. There is untold grace in the voluminous angel-wing sleeves and the blouse and skirt simulation is indeed cleverly introduced. Pervenche blue georgette was the medium chosen for this alluring creation with insets of allover lace.

Many there are who prefer the graceful negligee to the modern pajama ensembles. To such the following items will no doubt prove of special interest:

Brocaded velvets on georgette and chiffon grounds are the outstanding fabrics used for negligees. The silhouette of these models accents exaggerated flowing sleeves. In some garments the armhole falls almost to the waistline.

Sheer metal cloth strikes a sumptuous note and this is combined with

A Lovely Negligee.

Gilet inserts are one of the pleasing vagaries which do their bit toward imparting a winsome touch to the mode. Often the gilet or vestee is of contrasting crepe daintily buttoned and embroidered.

The vogue is spreading for rich red jersey frocks, the same either one or two-piece. With these the younger girl wears a "red, red rose" on the left shoulder.

It is becoming quite the custom to trim either silk or woolen weaves with velvet. A jungle-green frock of crepe with skirt portion formed of self-colored velvet tiers, also collar and cuffs black chiffon in the making of the negligee.

Very charming and easily made at home are the negligees of flower-printed chiffon, these lined with georgette in some lovely pastel shade. Fringed shawl effects are artfully embodied in negligees of complex styling. Hand-painted and beaded laces are effectively employed in negligee designing.

Much gold and silver lace is used this season for trimming the teagown or the negligee. Very pretentious robes employ considerable metal cloth in their fashioning.

DAIRY FACTS

MILK PRODUCTION EASY TO STABILIZE

Live-stock farmers can more nearly stabilize production than grain farmers. Weather does not influence live-stock production to as great an extent as grain crops. Dairy farmers can stabilize their production more than most classes of live stock for the reason that their production is constantly going to market. Labor also forms an important factor in the production of dairy products and is an additional factor which makes for stabilization.

The dairyman, however, has not equalized his production during the different seasons of the year, as much as might be generally profitable. During the high prices for butterfat in December there is only 5 or 6 per cent of the product marketed, while on the cheaper June market approximately 12 or 13 per cent of the product is sold.

Older dairy territories are rapidly correcting the summer milking tendency and are more nearly stabilizing production. They are doing this as it gives them more profit. If all of the dairymen in the country would change it would mean that winter dairying was not as profitable as summer dairying.

Feed and market conditions cause changes in the dairy market conditions. If feed prices are high as compared to the price of dairy products the feeding is curtailed, some cows are sold for beef, both helping to relieve the general market condition. When the opposite condition exists, which has been true in the past, feeding and milking are both expanded. The fact that butter prices are becoming lower at the present time is proof of the working of this factor.

West Virginia Dairyman Gives Some Poor Advice

Constantly farmers are told how to run a dairy herd, but seldom are they openly given advice on how to run it down.

A West Virginia farmer, long a dairyman, an honor pupil in the graduate school of experience and hard knocks, offers six rules for dairymen who want to flirt with bankruptcy. It's this way:

"Feed timothy to cows—it's good for race horses.

"Keep water ice cold—shivering gives the cows exercise.

"Cow-testing associations are needless—they show how to save and know.

"Don't have any windows in the barn—the hired man might look out.

"Avoid heavy milkers—they take up too much time.

"Don't weigh the milk—it might cause extra figuring."

Legume Hays and Grain Will Help Heifers Along

"Heifers that stop growing or that lose flesh, waste feed and interest on the money invested in them," says W. J. Fraser at the University of Illinois. He further points out that summer is the time to put cheap growth on heifers. Too often, because of poor pastures, heifers make too slow gains or are stunted.

Tests made by C. C. Hayden at the Ohio experiment station showed alfalfa hay to be slightly superior to soy-bean hay when fed liberally with corn. Either alfalfa, clover or soy-bean hay when fed with corn, is capable of supporting better than so-called normal growth in heifers. When legume hays and corn are available, Hayden concludes that a greater variety of proteins or high-protein grains do not seem necessary to grow choice heifers.

Oil Meal for Calves

A pound of gain for every three and one-third pounds of oil meal fed, was the record made in an Ohio calf feeding experiment. A saving of one-third the alfalfa hay was made when two pounds of oil meal was added to the ration of corn silage and alfalfa hay. Calves fed corn silage and alfalfa hay for 140 days gained at the rate of 1.33 pounds. The addition of two pounds of oil meal raised the daily gain to 1.93 pounds, an increase of .6 pound daily.

Three Kinds of Flies

There are three different kinds of flies that bother dairy cows to a large extent. The common house fly annoys cattle by crawling over them and feeding on the secretions about the eyes, etc., but do not suck blood. The stable fly is provided with a beak which enables it to suck blood. The horn fly, is distinctly smaller than either of the other two flies. Sanitation is the most important method of disposing of all these pests.

Satisfactory Dairy Barn

By the statement that every dairyman should have a suitable barn, it is not meant to imply that a fortune should be invested in one. Under present conditions, it is doubtful whether any farmer is justified in incurring great expense for the erection of an elaborate dairy barn. There are a few qualifications which make a dairy barn a suitable place. The most important are probably warmth, light, ventilation, sanitation and convenience.

Nigerian Cookery

The method of cooking a dinner for a family of Nigerian natives has continued unchanged since time immemorial. The native's kitchen is any convenient spot in the open and his method is to make a fire and, while it is getting well started, cut a number of skewers, on which strips of meat are impaled, according to the Wide World Magazine.

These skewers are stuck in the earth in a circle around the fire. When one side of the piece of meat is "done" in the opinion of the native chef, the skewer is given a twist so as to expose a fresh surface to the flames. The circumference of the circle of skewers varies with the number of persons to be fed.

Public-Spirited Australian

Melbourne, Australia, has the world's candy king. His name is MacRobertson, and he is said to be the richest man in the South seas, his fortune being placed close to $50,000,000. He has 17 large candy manufacturing plants and in his office there are models of all of them. He never tires studying his plants and planning ways and means to better the working condition of his 2,500 employees. Their average wage is $1,000 annually. For many years he has set aside a certain proportion of the profits from his business for charity, and every organized body in Australia gets a share of it yearly.

Atta Boy

Bill Stahl, editor of the Hoosier Farmer, is responsible for this one: A few days ago Bill said he was descending in an elevator, filled with men, in the Lincoln hotel, when a woman with a small boy entered from one of the midway floors. Immediately all of the men doffed their hats, and the youngster looked around in amazement. As the lobby was reached, the boy could restrain himself no longer.

"We," he said, looking at his mother, "we certainly made them take off their hats, didn't we?"—Indianapolis News.

The Mystery

"A passel of town folks came out tuther day and went in swimming in the creek beyond the bend, there," related Gap Johnson of Rumpus Ridge. "I sorter slid around and took a view of the sport, as you mought call it, or mebby you'd say, neecessity. 'Tennyrate, a spell after I got there one right fat lady—as big, drun' nigh, as a load of hay—took and dived off'n a stump into the water, and the creek ris six inches."

"Then what happened?" asked an acquaintance.

"I hain't the least idy in the world. I came away then."—Kansas City Star.

Gophers Fooled Him

When Seth VanPatten of Van Nuys, Calif., found that the gophers were eating up some of his prize vegetables, he dug a big hole in the middle of the gopher run and lit a small can of sulphur. When he came back to see how many were dead he found that the gophers had not only put out the sulphur blaze with soft dirt but had plugged up all holes leading from it to their subterranean chambers.

"JIFFY" NORTH IN COUNTY JAIL AGAIN

James Clinton North, familiarly known as "Jiffy" North, a well known Butler character, is again facing a charge of driving an automobile while intoxicated.

North has been punished on numerous occasions for public intoxication and in August, 1925, he was sent to the penal farm for six months on a drunken driving charge.

Sheriff, Wm. G. Morr, found North on the Mullet road nine miles east of Auburn late Sunday afternoon. He was driving Emery Dunn's car and Dunn was in the car with him. The sheriff said the pair were under the influence of liquor and both were arrested and lodged in the county jail to await a hearing. Dunn is accused of public intoxication.

AIDS TO HOUSEWIFE IN PREPARING MEALS

Sliced ham, baked in milk with sliced potatoes on top, is an excellent dinner dish.

One of the easiest ways of preparing egg-plant is to cut it in half length-wise and bake it with bacon laid in strips over the top.

Twice-baked bread, that has been cut or torn into pieces and heater in a very slow oven until thoroughly dried and delicately browned is a good food for children.

Do you know kohlrabi, sometimes called turnip-rooted cabbage? Pare the globe or bulbous stem, discarding any stringy or tough portions. Slice it and cook for about half an hour in slightly salted water. Season with butter, salt and pepper or serve with a white sauce.

Serve roast lamb or lamb chops piping hot, on a hot platter, and then on hot plates. The fat lamb has the peculiarity of sticking to the plate when cool, also to the palate and roof of the mouth. To most people this is unpleasant and it can be easily avoided by serving the lamb on very hot dishes.

Instead of candy, make sweets to tuck in the school boxes by grinding together in the meat chopper 1 pound of figs, 1 pound of dried prunes or seedless raisins (or both) and 1 pound of nutmeats. Mix thoroughly, roll out until about half an inch thick on a board dredged with confectioner's sugar, and cut into small pieces. Or make into balls, rolled in the sugar. Wrap in paraffin paper to keep.

The last green tomatoes have many uses. They make good pickles and chow chow, and also marmalade; they can be used for pie filling, for mock mince meat and serve fried.

CITY GETS VERDICT IN MOUNTZ'S TRIAL

Surety Company Must Pay City of Auburn Full Value of Bond, 5,000 and Interest

The City of Auburn won its suit against the American Surety Company of New York and Walter W. Mountz, co-defendant, the jury returning a verdict for the plaintiff for $5,000 and interest, the sum sought in the suit.

The jury was given the case at 5:15 Thursday afternoon and the verdict was returned at 8:15 Friday morning. The trial was held at Albion in the Noble circuit court and had been in progress since October 6th.

The suit was instituted to recover from the bonding company because of an alleged shortage of $8,030.53 in Mountz's accounts while acting as the collector of the Auburn water and light department. Public accountants checking up his books reported discrepancies. Mr. Mountz was indicated by a grand jury and a criminal action was tried in the DeKalb circuit court early this year, but the defendant was found not guilty.

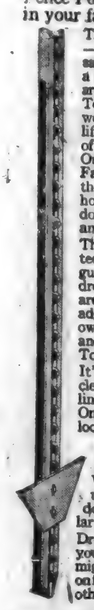
RIGHT here is the place to get those Red Top Steel Fence Posts you see advertised in your farm papers.



This Red Top is a proved post—tested by farmers in thousands of fence lines. It's got a mighty good record right around here. The studded Red Top is extra strong without a weak spot in it. It has a long life. You can drive over 200 of them in a day with the One-Man Driver. The Handy Fasteners that come free with the posts are made so as to hold the wire securely, thus doing away with restapling and restretching.

The Red Top post is guaranteed by the maker. Their guarantee is worth one hundred cents on the dollar. We are authorized to make all adjustments. So we put our own personal endorsement and guarantee on every Red Top we sell.

It's just that kind of an article we like to handle in all lines, the leader in its field. One of the main points we look at in our buying is to get the makes of goods that give our customers the most value for the money. We don't expect to prosper unless you get a good big dollar's worth for every dollar you spend.

Drop in and see us when you're in town. Prices are mighty reasonable just now on fencing materials and many other special items.

ST. JOE YOUNG PEOPLE WED SATURDAY

Carl Perkins, 25, farmer, and Miss Edna M. Jackson, 22, teacher, both of St. Joe, were united in marriage at the M. P. Parsonage at Muncie, by Rev. C. H. Havens. From ther they went to Indianapolis to visit friends, being accompanied by Miss Ima Bray and Harcourt Miser.

The young folks are both graduates of the St. Joe High School and Mrs. Perkins attended school at Winona and Angola and then taught for three years.

Carl has been engaged in farming since completing high school in 1920, taking courses in agriculture at Purdue each year, and is very successful in his vocation.

They will make their home with the bride's father, C. B. Jackson in St. Joe.

We join their many friends in extending congratulations.

SCHOOL FACULTY WERE ENTERTAINED

A very pleasant masquerade party was given Saturday night at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Milliman for the members of the faculty and friends. The house was prettily decorated with autumn leaves, black cats and bats, and crepe paper garlands. After a "spook walk," the guests unmasked and a program of stunts, games and contests was enjoyed. Refreshments, consisting of sandwiches, perfection salad in apple cups, pickles, pumpkin pie and cider, were served.

Those who enjoyed the evening were: R. L. Case, Max White, A. G. Hercules, Mrs. Pearl Oberlin, Mrs. Garnet Grube, Miss Pauline Wasson, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Grimm, Mr. and Mrs. Sam Kees, Mr. and Mrs. M. E. Gruber and Mr. and Mrs. Carl Thomas and son, Dale.

CALIFORNIA IS HEARD FROM

My dear old friend Fred:—

It is with much pleasure that I read The News and especially when I read of Chas. Reasoner's large pumpkin and the large pan of Ira Bone. So I see that Hoosier soil has not lost any of its growing propensities since I grew 28 potatoes which made a full bushel basket and gave them to Sol Barney and also grew a large pumpkin which took first prize at Auburn Street Fair and brought me $15.00 worth of queensware. Tell Chas. Reasoner to send me just nine seeds as I am prparing six lots to hold one pumpkin. By planting one hill in the middle I think the soil might produce one about that size. I enclose $1.50 to apply on subscription.

Yours for more pumpkins,
A. J. Collins,
Red Bluff, Cal.

HARD WINTER AHEAD

Hard winters run in cycles over a long period of years, according to observations of the United States weather bureau. Based upon this admitted fact the country is due this year for one of the most severe cold seasons since the abnormal winter of 1917.

FORMER PASTOR HAS SUCCESSFUL PASTORATE

A big home coming and Rally Day was observed at the Mt. Pisgah Lutheran church, west of here with an all day meeting on Sunday. Rev. S. D. Steffey, former pastor of the Walton Lutheran church, is the now pastor of the Pisgah church. The forenoon program was given for communion and receiving of new members into the church. One hundred and sixteen people communed and thirty-nine were taken into the church, for which many compliments were extended to Rev. Steffey for his splendid progress in the church. A delicious dinner was served at the noon hour. The afternoon program consisted of several solos, duets, readings and Miss Edna Burrous and her violin choir, followed by a splendid address by Rev. Wheadon, pastor of he St. Luke's Lutheran church in Logansport, and prayer by Rev. Harrington of the Pleasant Valley church. A large and appreciative audience attended and enjoyed the day.—Logansport Press.

At this same church since Rev. Steffey became the pastor, he has baptized 22 children and at the country church, Mt. Pisgah, he has received nine into the church and baptized two children.

Rev. Steffey was always on the job and his success so far this year in the new field has demonstrated this same earnestness in the church work, that many have joined the church, wanting to share in its burdens and to have their influence on the side of right.

CAMPAIGN STORIES ARE CIRCULATING

Isn't it a shame what stories are told during any campaign to injure some candidate? Why this is, we can't say, anr why people will take stock in such unreasonable things, is more than we can say. Even matters pertaining to township finances come in for its share of mis-treatment. The latest story in circulation is, that St. Joe does not pay into the township treasury, one cent to pay for salary of the trustee. This is as far from the truth as any thing can be. Here are the facts in the case:

"A levy of three cents is placed on each one hundred dollars worth of taxable property in St. Joe Town and Concord Township. This three cent levy is placed in a separate fund known as the Township Fund. The Trustee draws his salary from this said fund."

TRESPASSING AND HUNTING FORBIDDEN

B. & O. ENGINE STRIKES CAR—LITTLE DAMAGE

Wm. Bleeks had a hair raising experience at the B. & O. crossing at the west end of town, Thursday morning, when an engine, west bound, struck the back end of his Ford. Mr. Bleeks had waited until a train had passed east, and he pulled across immediately without looking east, and he just cleared the track enough to save a complete smashup. His car was damaged but he received no bodily injuries.

LEADERS IN CONGRESS PRAISE DAVID HOGG

Has Made Unusual Record

Hon. William R. Green, chairman of Ways and Means Committee, Hon. Martin B. Madden, chairman of the powerful committee of Appropriation and other outstanding leaders of Congress have given their personal testimony concerning David Hogg. Hon. William R. Green of Iowa, chairman of Ways and Means Committee, said:

"The activity of David Hogg of Indiana in Congress for Farm Relief, Increases of Benefits for Veterans and their dependents, of the people of Indiana, is of the highest order.

He is a capable and honest advocate of the benefits of a protective tariff and his speech in the House was a clean cut and compelling presentation of the facts. David Hogg because of his ability and character has the confidence and highest respect of all his colleagues. He should be returned."

Honorable Martin B. Madden of Illinois, chairman of Committee on Appropriations, said:

"David Hogg came as a new man in the 69th Congress. His intelligence, unselfish ability, and open mind were at once evident to the leaders of the House and he was elected to membership on a major committee. He gave the most unselfish devotion and untiring zeal and assistance to the problems before Congress.

In Congress we are proud of his record and the entire State of Indiana as well as the Twelfth District are, I am sure, also proud of him. I hope that the voters of the Twelfth District will in their wisdom return him to represent them."

Hon. L. J. Dickinson of Iowa, Farm Leader in the House of Representatives, said:

"David Hogg is a true and reliable representative of the farmer in Congress. During the last session he obtained from every source all information at hand on the farm problem. He understands the farm situation today. With ability and perseverance he worked with me for the passage of farm legislation. No member of Congress has a more sincere desire than he to help the farmer.

The farmers of the nation need him and more like him in Congress."

Hon. Clyde Kelly, leader of Pennsylvania delegation in Congress, said:

"As a colleague of David Hogg of Indiana on one of the most important committees of the House I know at first hand his thorough going work and outstanding ability.

During my fourteen years in Congress I have served with many men. Not one of them has been better equipped in high standards of private and official conduct in the high qualities of leadership than David Hogg. He is making for himself a worthy place in the United States Congress, and if returned by his district from term to term, he is certain to become an outstanding leader. His service has reflected honor upon himself and his district."

Hon. John Q. Tilson, of Connecticut, Republican Leader, said:

"David Hogg of Indiana has been effective and faithful for the best interest of his State and District. His services are needed in Congress. Because of his ability, energy and character, he has the unqualified confidence of his associates.

first term he was elected to membership to a major committee of the House.

I endorse with all possible emphasis his candidacy for his re-election."

New, said:

"I am very much interested in the election of David Hogg. He is a member of the Major Committee of Post Office and Post Roads and his work in that committee and in Congress is most commendable.

I speak from actual knowledge of that work. I wish we had more men in Congress like David Hogg. His record is a matter of personal satisfaction to me."

ST. JOE CITIZEN DROPS DEAD

Our community received a great shock, when about 10:30 o'clock last Monday, it was informed that Martin Tustison, an esteemed citizen and pioneer business man of St. Joe was found dead in his own door yard on Widney Avenue. Mr. Tustison upon being questioned concerning the state of his health, but a few hours before his death, replied he was feling fine. He was engaged in hauling som brick in a whelbarrow, for repair work about his home, when interrogated as above.

The funeral services were held at the Lutheran church on Wednesday of this week, at 10 o'clock. Rev. A. K. Mumma of Harlan, officiating. The obituary will appear next week.

Ideal VECTO Heater

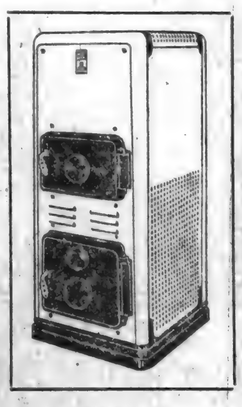
BETTER Warmth with GREATER Economy

For Solid Comfort, Health, and the Utmost in Economy

DO you want your little home to be a place of cheer and comfort? Clean to live in and safe and healthful for the children? Do you want it to be snug and warm in every nook, and at the same time have the pleasure of knowing that you are actually saving money on your coal bills?

It is all within your reach.

A compact, self-contained, beautiful heating unit has been perfected which warms, not one room, but a whole home—and yet consumes only as much coal, or less, than is now used by old-fashioned methods to heat one room! This is the Ideal Vecto Heater.



Its warmth is clean and healthful. It requires no basement for installation; it is an ornament in any room. For more or less heat, you need but turn a handle. Compact and selfcontained, it may be moved like furniture. It burns either coal or wood, and will serve you faithfully and efficiently during your lifetime. The price of the Ideal Vecto Heater is very low; and you can enjoy its warmth and comfort while it is helping to pay for itself by its economy in fuel consumption. This truly wonderful Heater has been developed in our Institute of Thermal Research, the largest heating laboratory in the world.

NOVEL PLAIDS AND TWEEDS; FINE CLOTH MAKES FINE GOWNS

IN THE "comfy" luxurious woolen coats now so popular the ideal of smart utility is attained. The new topcoats glow with vivacious coloring as they tell their fascinating story of plaids and checks, cubes and diamond shapes, zigzag stripes and modernistic patternings. Novelty is the specialty of present-day cloakings and they enact the part in spectacular fashion, completing the color scheme by collaborating with blended fur.

An exponent of the coat ideal for school or business wear is here pictured. It presents color in indescribable interminglings of brown, green, red and beige. The relating of pocket and belt in a single unit stresses the intricate cloth treatment which characterizes all dress and coat designing just now. The tawny fur on collar and cuffs reflects the warm reddish tone which prevails throughout the novelty woolen weave of the coat.

For School or Business Wear.

Three outstanding color tones influence the smartest cloakings. These are rust, deep wine and green, dark or light. That is no matter if plaided, checked or otherwise patterned there is a characteristic color which asserts itself. The smart herringbone tweeds come in a range of charming colors and they often present multitoned mixtures.

Conservative and practical, yet most elegant, is an English tweed describing an "indivisible" plaid, straight-lined in cut, very simply belted but handsomely revered and collared this season over the dress of feminized and ornate styling. However, do not forget in this mad rush toward greater elaborations that during the hours of morning on avenue and boulevard utmost chic is expressed by the woman who would a-shopping go, who wears a coat-frock strictly tailored of fine cloth. Milady, versed in the art of correct dressing, invariably makes it a rule to have at least one handsome tailleur in her dress collection. A cloth gown as genuinely good-styled as is the model in this picture is just such as she would be apt to select.

Style-supremacy is at once apparent in the fine deep navy-colored wool twill selected for the development of this coat-dress. Its claim as an exponent of the truly high class is substantiated in the clever positioning of godets so that skirt fullness is forced to the back. The sleeves reveal the latest style trend, which is to bell at the wrist. Exclusive taste is finding supreme satisfaction in man-tailored navy cloth dresses this season. Another interesting outcome of the vogue for the cloth dress is the interest shown in black broadcloth.

A Good-Styled Cloth Gown.

With seal, panels of which uniquely trim the sleeve.

Speaking of these seal panels, which in this instance extended from elbow to wrist at the back of the sleeve, calls to mind the eccentric placement of fur which features the "last word" modes from Paris. For example, fur pockets curiously shaped, are set at an out-of-the-ordinary angle.

As to treatment of fur on sleeves, there is no end to the novelty expressed. The fur below-the-elbow puff and the fur half-sleeve are something distinctly different.

Choose as many bright silken and whimsical frocks "as thy purse can buy," for the mode waxes eloquent

In a recent black broadcloth coat-dress there was some suggestion of the directoire, it having a high-buttoned collar and double-breasted closing, which opened to form revers.

Two other versions of the one-piece cloth frock feature in the newer collections, namely the surplice front opening and the simply styled princess effect. Speaking of the former, these brought-over-to-one side fastenings make use of tabs, straps, buckles and buttons. The princess cloth types are without trimming, button from neck to hem at the front.

Formal Greetings Somewhat Hollow

When the President of the United States one day sends birthday congratulations to the king of swat, another day cables congratulations on the anniversary of the promulgation of their constitution to the President of whatisit, and again sends congratulations to the premier of Iodine for the same reason, you can just make up your mind that somebody else in the service of our government is keeping track of all these things for him, says the Pathfinder Magazine.

Do you suppose that President Coolidge would pause in the midst of landing a big trout in the waters of the Minnetonka just to send birthday greetings to the chief of the Bozo tribe? No, the State department at Washington has a specially organized force which keeps tab on birthdays of foreign rulers and other days of rejoicing in the various countries with which we are friendly, diplomatically at least.

Even-Handed Justice

The Manchester (England) Guardian writes: "The Hull coroner, who censured himself in court for failing to call certain essential evidence, is not the first legal officer to pass judgment on his own shortcomings.

A year or two ago an English magistrate in East Africa, when hunting, found that he had shot a female elephant, which it was not legal to shoot. Being a man of sensitive conscience, he reviewed the crime and fined himself a substantial sum. Later he discovered that other shooters of female elephants had got off much more lightly, and so, as culprit, he appealed against his own decision as magistrate, asking that the fine should be reduced. The Appeal court, however, upheld the sentence in its entirety.

Replied Mr. Shaw: "I find in him a great resemblance to Paderewski." A painful pause. Then, "But, Mr. Shaw, Paderewski is not a violinist."

"You mean Mr. Baxter? Yes, I saw him. He has gone down to Coyote."

The repression of his tone drew Maria's attention. She turned and looked at him, the lamp, unshaded, in her hand, its light full on Caleb's face. She gasped and then a sort of baleful joy flitted over her swarthy face.

"Madre de Dios! You met heem, Seguro! An' you fought weech heem, Bueno! I hope you spoiled for heem that han'some face. May he never return—that Baxter! Eef he does, eet is better for heem that he does not meet Padilla. Si, for Padilla weel not use his feests. An' now you mus' wash that blood from your face, senor. I weel breeng warm water to the room where you sleep before. After you eat, you weel find all ready."

Her speech, fierce at the start, had softened. She bestowed a nod of approval on Caleb, her eyes kindly, and swept out. It was plain that Baxter had lost favor at El Nido. It was equally plain that Maria had meant to convey that much to Caleb, together with her emphatic indorsement of the fight that he had not contradicted.

The coffee and sandwiches finished, Caleb went through the patio to the room, finding a lamp, warm water and towels. He made himself more presentable, though the bruises and abrasions where the steel wire had marked his flesh still persisted. Cleansed and refreshed, he lit his pipe and strolled through the patio to where the three cars were parked, Kennedy's, Baxter's roadster and Conklin's machine. Conklin had a chauffeur, his practice was evidently larger and more profitable than that of the physician from Coyote. The man spoke to him civilly. He was examining Baxter's car.

"Anything wrong with it?" asked Caleb.

"Nothing wrong with the car. Only with the bean of the guy that owns it. Let his battery run down. No juice. The Spanish dame says he cussed it up and down when he tried to start it. Nothin' doin' an' he has to hoof it way down the canyon."

It seemed to piece up now—the idea that Baxter had offended Betty Clinton and had been summarily dismissed. So summarily, that, finding his car batteries useless, he had decided to leave the car to be sent for and stalked off down canyon in a mood that Caleb had been ready to match.

"Mr. Warner?"

Doctor Conklin had come out of the house. Caleb joined him.

"There's nothing more that I can do. I must get back to Paloma. I've suggested that you go with me. There's a nurse needed. It would be a good idea to get Burton, though Kennedy will stay, and is doing all that can be done. The trouble culminates rapidly, but Miss Clinton naturally wants Burton.

"He may not be able to get here in time. It's touch and go. Clinton is not a strong man. He got caught in the hills in the storm. Drenched! Then his horse wrenched a fetlock in fording the swollen stream and Clinton led it home. D—d foolishness! I have suggested that you can get in touch with Burton as soon as you reach a phone. I can get you to Paloma in time for the ten o'clock train—last one tonight. And you may be able to arrange about a nurse. She'll have to come back with Burton in his car."

"Of course," Caleb replied, "I'll see that a nurse arrives. If you'll give me some addresses and names to round up if I can't get one through Burton."

"Good. I knew you'd tackle it, Warner. Told her so. Hop in. We haven't too much time."

They started without a chance for Caleb to see the girl again. But he was in her service and she would know that.

At Paloma station with a few minutes to spare, the doctor wrote down the address of a nurses' home and the names of the women he preferred on such a case.

"If you can't get any of these, try the second address," he said. "Mention Burton's name with the case. Carries more weight than mine. And get that nurse over here tonight. If you can't raise Burton here's a note that will get you oxygen—two tanks—that must come with the nurse. It may make all the difference. Here comes your train. Good luck to you."

Caleb got a working wire to Golden at the Oakville Ferry and he let the boat go, putting in the twenty minutes before the next one to making arrangements. He got a nurse and told her to hold herself in readiness. He also got the oxygen. Burton was on a case and could not leave.

Arrived across the bay he found car and nurse awaiting him. Fifteen minutes saw the oxygen loaded in the car and they caught the midnight ferry for the return. They slid off the boat to the apron at Oakville Estuary at the first moment and went rocketing through the night to Paloma and onto the sideroad, plowing up that with the full energy of the high-powered car, rushing across the valley and sounding the strident klaxon to let the ranch know that they were coming.

Kennedy stood waiting to meet them.

"It's touch and go," he said. "Where's the oxygen? Did you get it? Thank God! It may save him. Come, nurse."

Maria came out for the nurse's grip.

"She stay here tonight," she said.

"Of course. I am going back for Doctor Burton. How is Mr. Clinton?"

"Ah, he is seeck—seeck! I pray—but I do not know, senor. I am 'fraid." Her face worked with the emotion expressed in her voice, the car lamps showed her eyes red with weeping.

At four o'clock Caleb got in touch with Doctor Burton, sleepless from long vigil.

"A cup of coffee and I'm off," he said. "It's over one way or another by this but I'll go, of course. Clinton and his girl are old friends as well as patients. As for you, young man," he added suddenly, bending his gaze on Caleb, "you're all in. What the devil have you been up to? A hot bath and bed for you. Instantly. You look as as if you had been taking part in a riot."

Caleb felt like it. Despite his anxiety, he succumbed to sleep in the cab. He dropped into unconsciousness the moment he stretched out between the sheets. The sun was flooding the room when he awakened. It was a glorious morning, vital, hopeful. Caleb went immediately to his telephone.

"Are there any messages for me?" he asked the operator. The girl gave him the office number of Doctor Burton, that had been left with her and, on his request, got him the connection. The doctor's office nurse spoke briefly. Caleb hung up the hook softly. Betty Clinton's father was dead.

CHAPTER XIII

Baxter Strikes

Caleb did not feel that his present relations admitted of his writing a letter of condolence to Betty Clinton and he would have been at loss how to word it. To send flowers, much as he desired to do something to express the sympathy that he felt for her supreme sorrow, was the function of relatives and friends more intimate than he. But Mrs. Carquines helped him out of his quandary. He met her on the street, on her way to the Vedders. Betty, she told him, was almost prostrated, but was now bearing up bravely.

"You've Had a Falling Out With Baxter?" He Said Abruptly.

"She takes things standing up," said the artist's wife. "She told me of all you did for them the night her father was taken ill. She is very grateful. I shall tell her that I have seen you," she ended, as she shook hands. "Is there any message you would like me to give her?"

"My sympathy, my wish that I could do something. That is all."

Hinckley had a suite of offices in the building of the Crystal Springs Water company. He turned over to Caleb one of these rooms with its draughting equipment, and there Caleb worked hard over his plans while Hinckley, with the engineering staff, was making fuller investigation across the bay with a view to confirmation of the project. Options were already being carefully negotiated for, ten days should see the deal assured and actual work commenced in the field.

Caleb caught only a glimpse or two of Mary Morgan. Cox's offices where she worked in her capacity of assistant to the president's secretary were on another floor from Caleb's room. He knew, through his bank, that she had received the money, he imagined that she had given notice to the company and was waiting for its expiration before going away.

Baxter had seemingly dropped out of sight. Caleb had changed his living quarters at the beginning of the month, which was a week after the meeting in the canyon, and he had not met him, though he had occasionally heard him leaving or entering his room, or moving about it. He knew that Baxter was "posted" on the delinquency board at the Altruists for dues and dining-room chits. It was plain that the sale of Hermanos valley had fallen through.

Cox came one morning into Caleb's office and discussed general progress for a few moments before he took a seat across from the high stool on which Caleb worked at his drawings.

"You've had a falling out with Baxter?" he said abruptly. "He's after your scalp and seems to be tolerably cocksure he's going to get it," he went on, not waiting for comment. "He came to me this morning with a proposition that involved, with our acceptance of it, your dismissal, or at least the relegation of you to a subordinate position, so far as your identification with the project is concerned. I was busy and I made an appointment for three o'clock. I should like you to be present."

"Thanks," said Caleb. "I'll be very glad of the opportunity."

He did not offer and Cox did not seem to expect any explanations. He could not tell exactly what Baxter had for weapons but he rather fancied he knew the principal one that would be employed—and he was ready with a parry that would prove a bit disconcerting. This weapon was a boomerang he had long known the existence of and looked forward to seeing it launched only to return, and strike the thrower. It was only since his talk with Mary Morgan at Haight's that he had considered Baxter as likely to use it.

Baxter was the type of man who would never blame himself under any conditions. To the score against Caleb he would undoubtedly set the denial of the loan, the loss of the Hermanos valley sale, his dismissal by Betty Clinton on the night of her father's sickness and death, and the fight on the bridge in which he had been first worsted and then rescued by Caleb. The rescue would be an ignominy. It was doubtful whether Baxter had been normal since his mother's marriage. His brain had been under stimulation or depression of alcohol—practically continually. He had brooded over his reverses and now Caleb was placed as sole author of all his troubles, the target of his vindictiveness against conditions.

Prepared as he was in a measure for the interview, it struck him that here was a test to see how far he could depend upon Cox where the company's best interests were at stake. Cox knew about the boomerang. It was the decent thing for Cox to do to ask him to be present. Mighty decent.

Caleb's face was grim when he entered Cox's office at three o'clock, his eyes were narrowed and his lean jaw jutted, bossed with tense muscles. Cox pushed over cigars with a greeting genially modulated as usual. There was a difference, though; Cox's eyes were cold as shadow ice. As Caleb lit his cigar in his chair the buzzer sounded and Cox took up his desk phone with a little nod at Caleb. The nod was confidential—warning, despite the frosty eyes.

"All right, show him in," he said.

Baxter entered, jaunty, well-dressed, his head held confidently. But he looked the worse for wear, for all his mien. He smelled of the barber shop, but massage had not changed the flabbiness of his putty-colored flesh nor taken the rings from beneath slightly bloodshot eyes. He stared hard at Caleb and then sneered.

Again Caleb recollected Field's prediction. It looked as if it was swiftly coming to pass. Baxter's eyes had lost humanity; there was no more soul in them than there would have been in artificial orbs of transparent glass back of which crimson light was burning. The sneer was more of a snarl, that of a beast. His whole face was animal.

"I understood this was to be a confidential interview," he said.

Some Facts About Washington Shaft

Now that the Washington monument is temporarily closed to the public, for the installation of a new elevator, it is but natural, perhaps, that some of the facts that are associated with it and which have been taken for granted should interestingly be recalled. For instance, not everyone knows that the number going up the monument in a single day has often exceeded 10,000, or that there is not an officially inscribed line anywhere on the monument indicative even of the fact that the structure is in honor of George Washington. The shaft, by the way, was started in 1848, but after 150 feet or so of the total 555 were completed, there was a long period of suspension, due largely to the fact that the movement to finance it by popular subscription collapsed. The present simplicity of the structure was not originally contemplated, for around the base of the obelisk there was to have been a circular colonnaded building, while a decorated shaft with cornices and up-and-down indentures, etc., was part of the design.—Christian Science Monitor.

Accepting Apology

A lively discussion between two men led to a row when one told the other he lied. The offended one rushed forward and they clinched. The other man exclaimed: "I reiterate that you're a liar!"

To the astonishment of those around, the aggrieved man let go his hold. "Oh, well," he said, "I accept the apology. If a man says he reiterates that's all a gentleman can ask."

He did not understand why the bystanders laughed, but the fight was off.—Boston Transcript.

The DAIRY

COW TESTING PAYS LARGE DIVIDENDS

Records kept by cow-testing associations in North Carolina pay large dividends when the results are studied and applied to the owner's herd, states J. A. Arey, dairy extension specialist at the North Carolina State college.

Mr. Arey gives the experience of two herds in one of these associations. One herd contained 21 cows, while the other had only 9, yet the difference in profit over feed cost, was only $5.01 in favor of the larger herd. The owner milked, fed, and tended 12 cows the greater part of a year for $5.01. The net receipts were $367.59 for the larger herd as compared with $362.58 for the small herd. The owner of the smaller herd had better cows and fed them in proportion to their production.

There is a gradual improvement in all herds where the testing work is being carried on, states Mr. Arey. The production cost shows a decrease with a corresponding increase in actual production. This, he finds, is due to the adoption of better feeding methods and the elimination of the low producing cows.

"There has been an average of 20 cows sold each month from the herds in the five cow-testing associations in the state," says Mr. Arey, "and this elimination will continue until all unprofitable cows have been sold or slaughtered.

"Twenty-five cows in the Wake-Durham association were found to be unprofitable and were either sold or butchered. In the Forsyth-Davie association seven cows were sold for beef, and other associations report numbers ranging from three to seventeen as being sold or slaughtered.

"A standard dairy ration recommended by the dairy extension specialists is being used in all herds, and records show that the average production and cost is very close in all associations."

Train Calf by Gentle Treatment at All Times

Make the calf like to be handled. This can best be accomplished by gentle treatment at all times. Teach the calf to lead by handling it gently. One good way to do this training is to use a small stick. The calf should walk on the right side of you and should be trained to mind the stick.

Teach the calf to stand quickly in one position. Then it should be trained to stand with its weight evenly distributed on all four legs, which should be squarely placed. The head should be held up and to the front and the back straight and firm.

Because the calf which flinches, pulls, kicks, is easily frightened, or stands in a position that makes its back sway, or its rump appear faulty does not readily catch the eye of the judge, the calf should become accustomed to strange people, sights, and sounds. A little training every day is much better than a half day of it once each month.

Large Amount of Silage Proves Harmful to Bull

Many farmers allow the bull to run with the herd and consequently pay no particular attention to his feed. Where silage forms a part of the ration this is to be discouraged.

It has been proved that a liberal amount of silage, six pounds or over, promotes sterility in the bull. From the data gathered in numerous experiments it would seem that even a small allowance will reduce his vitality. With farmers learning to have milch cows freshen in the fall it would appear that silage can be wholly omitted from the ration for the bull.

It is true that the bull recovers from the effect of silage, but this means early spring calves, a thing that the man with milk cows does not want.

Dairy Notes

Excellent feed, good care, or proper management cannot make a good dairy cow out of a poorly bred "off-type" heifer.

Skim milk powder and semi-solid buttermilk are being used extensively in the baking trade. They are opening another large field for dairy products.

The calves should be fed on whole milk for at least two weeks before giving them substitute, as there is no substitute for milk for the very young calf.

The silo puts all the corn plant where you can use it. The crib stores only part of it. The rest goes to waste.

When running the separator, avoid irregular speed or sudden jerks on the handle. Steady, uniform operation brings the best results.

A bull pen that gives plenty of opportunity to exercise is the thing. Good air, sunshine and grass in season are essential.

A WARNING

Hallowe'en night will soon be here and should be celebrated on the night before, as Sunday is the 31st. And we might give you a tip, that it is unlawful to remove any property from the premises where it belongs and is unlawful to trespass on private property without the owner's permission.

The old custom of upsetting out buildings and removing property, always occurred a loss to the owners and we fear if any depredations of this sort occur it will cause the invaders to be severely prosecuted. However, the majority of the people nowadays celebrate this occasion in a much better way, such as parties, dances, masquerades, etc.

One Who Knows.

LEWIS HOWEY LEFT ESTATE TO TWO DAUGHTERS

The late Lewis Howey, in his will probated in the DeKalb circuit court, left all his property to his daughters. Jennette Provines and Gladys Carper, with the provision that they provide one-fourth of the care of his mother, Elizabeth Wasson, should such care be necessary. They are also to pay one-fourth part of Mrs. Wasson's funeral expenses is she should die without sufficient funds to pay them.

A son-in-law, Jesse Provines was nominatd in the will for executor and he qualified by filing $2,000 bond, with his wife and Mrs. Carper as sureties.

The estate consists of $1,000 in personal property and $5,600 in real estate.

The will was executed June 26, 1926. Mr. Howey, who was a former trustee of Jackson township, died October 19th.

The W. C. T. U. will meet Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. Ed Miser.

Mrs. Martha Quance and two little sons of Auburn and mother, Mrs. Moon, spent Tuesday afternoon with Mrs. Sylvia Ginther, south of town.

Lesson for October 24

JOSHUA, ISRAEL'S NEW LEADER

LESSON TEXT—Num. 27:18-20; Joshua 1:1-9.

GOLDEN TEXT—Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord, thy God is with thee withersoever thou goest.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Joshua the New Leader.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Task of Joshua.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Secret of a Strong and Useful Life.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Preparation for True Service.

The book of Joshua, from which our lesson is taken, is a history of the conquest of the promised land and its division among the tribes of Israel. It takes its name from its principal character, Joshua.

I. Joshua, the New Leader of Israel (Num. 27:18-20).

The people were not to be left in doubt as to a leader when Moses was gone. The leader was to be appointed and given recognition before all the congregation.

During the wilderness journey Joshua was Moses' minister and the captain of his army. When Moses was denied the privilege of going over the Jordan, Joshua was appointed to the leadership of Israel. Moses, the representative of the law, brought Israel to the borders of Canaan. Joshua was the man chosen to lead the people into the place of rest. The name "Joshua" has the same derivation as the name "Jesus."

II. Joshua Commanded to Take Charge (Josh. 1:2).

Moses was dead, but God's work must go on, therefore God issued the command for the new leader to assume his duty.

III. God Renews His Promise to Israel Concerning the Land (Josh. 1:3, 4).

This promise had been given to Abraham and renewed to Isaac, Jacob and Moses. It is now renewed to Israel as they were about to enter upon its possession. The borders of the land were "from the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the River Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun." The nearest this territory was ever possessed was during the reign of David and Solomon, though not then fully realized. This land still belongs to the Jews, and in God's own time they shall possess it. Their possession of this land was due entirely to themselves. God promised them that wherever their feet stood upon the land it was theirs.

IV. God's Presence Promised (Josh. 1:5).

Joshua was entering upon a perilous and difficult enterprise, but the Lord said as He was with Moses, so He would be with him. The difficulties before him were:

1. The Jordan river (v. 2).

This river was now at its flood (Josh. 3:15), making it impossible for armies to cross.

2. The people were living in walled cities (Num. 13:28).

Notwithstanding this, God was ready to insure success.

(1) "I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" (v. 5).

(2) "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee."

(3) "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee." Joshua had been with Moses throughout their forty years' experience from the Egyptian deliverance to the time of his death. Because he believed that God was with his master, he was willing and ready to cross the Jordan at its floodtide and courageously meet the enemies on the other side.

V. Conditions of Blessing in the Land (Josh. 1:6-9).

1. "Be strong and of good courage" (v. 6).

His mission was to go in and divide the land among the tribes for an inheritance. It required strength and courage to do this.

2. "Unwavering obedience to the Word of God (v. 7).

In a land of idolatry it required much courage to be true to God. Prosperity and success were conditioned upon unswerving obedience to God's commands. In all his work he must conform his life to the law of God. To pass from the path outlined therein would bring disaster and ruin. In order to accomplish this the law of the Lord must be in his mouth continually. He was to meditate therein day and night.

Joshua rendered prompt obedience, he did not stop to cavil, but at once gave order for the march. God made the plan and gave the directions.

POULTRY

BLACKHEAD MOST SERIOUS DISEASE

The name "blackhead" comes from the fact that the head sometimes turns dark color, although this is not an ever-present symptom. This condition frequently affects turkeys, and more particularly the young than old, but in rare cases it has been known to affect chickens. For turkeys it is a most serious disease, and often makes turkey raising difficult, writes Dr. George H. Conn in the Farm Journal.

The disease is caused by the ameba melagridis. This can be found in the affected birds in the liver and the bowels. The disease is spread by droppings from affected birds. The first symptoms noticed are a dullness and a drooping of the tail and wings. The feathers are ruffled, and the birds become inactive. A yellowish-green diarrhea follows, together with lack of appetite and rapid weakening and loss of flesh. Death comes in from three days to a week after the first symptoms, although in extreme cases the bird may live ten days. Occasionally the disease develops a chronic form which will linger on for many weeks.

The very best sanitary measures must be taken immediately. Sick birds should be separated from the well birds, and the well ones put in new quarters. Frequently it is necessary to discontinue the raising of turkeys for a year or so on an infected farm. In securing new birds to start the flock, it is always advisable to determine whether or not this condition has been present in the flock at any previous season. Birds from an infected flock should not be sold to other breeders.

Thorough disinfection, especially of the places where the flocks roost, is necessary. Be careful to see that when feeding and watering the flock everything is as sanitary as possible.

Potassium permanganate placed in the drinking water, and also dissolved in water and mixed with feed, is a preventive of this disease. Use of this remedy with every hatch of turkeys until they are at least several weeks old is worth-while insurance against loss of young turkeys.

Important That Ducks Have Sufficient Water

Ducks must have water when they eat. The duck has no crop such as the chicken has; its food will clog and choke it unless water is provided at meal time. Water must be deep enough to cover the holes in the beak. Note how the ducks blow out the air and dust from their nostrils when they have the luxury of snorting in deep water.

Do not give ducks, geese or chickens sweet milk one day and sour milk the next. The sour milk is better for them; sweet milk lacks the lactic acid which is wholesome, and will glue the eyes shut and clog the beaks since ducks fairly bathe their heads in it if deep enough. Ducks are not naturally dirty and they will not thrive in damp and dirt. When they go down on their legs, fall backwards or act crazy they are either suffering from coccidiosis, a parasitic disease of the intestines caused largely from eating over fowl-sick ground that is infected; or they are lacking in mineral elements in the ration. It is a good plan to put sand in their mash once a day, and also to give them bone meal or meat scraps.

Use Sodium Fluoride to Destroy Lice on Fowls

Don't allow lice to get a good foothold in your flock. The entire flock can be treated with sodium fluoride, a white powder that can be purchased in bulk. This powder can be applied by taking a pinch and working it well down between the feathers next to the skin around the neck and vent.

Equal parts of blue or mercuric ointment and vaseline is also effective. Place a small quantity of the ointment about the size of a pea on the skin below the vent. Be sure and treat every bird in the flock, for the fowl that gets away will carry enough lice to reinfest the entire flock in a short time.

Markers for Layers

No doubt, many flocks are less profitable than they might be, because the owners have no method by which they can identify old hens which are not worth keeping beyond the second year. One of the simplest methods is to use ordinary metal bands which can be placed around the bird's left leg when put in winter quarters, and a similar band put around the right leg in 1926. This method of marking will make it easy to cull a flock.

Turkeys for Breeding

Those who are interested in securing turkeys for breeding stock should make their selection early. Usually the early-maturing turkeys are sold for the early trade and the slower maturing fowls are kept over for the later markets. Breeding stock should come from the very best stock. Turkeys that make rapid gains and mature quickly are the ones best suited for breeding purposes. It is a serious mistake to take the smaller birds on account of cheapness.

TWO FAMOUS WOMEN BORN IN SAME YEAR

Queen Victoria and Lydia E. Pinkham

MRS. ANNA McHENRY
1005 E. PLUM STREET, MARSHALL, ILLINOIS

In the year 1819, two babies were born whose lives were destined to have a far-reaching influence. One was born in a stern castle of Old England, the other in a humble farmhouse in New England.

Queen Victoria through her wisdom and kindliness during a long and prosperous reign has become enthroned in the hearts of the British people. Lydia E. Pinkham through the merit of her Vegetable Compound has made her name a household word in thousands of American homes.

Marshall, Illinois.—"After my second child was born, I never saw a well day for five years. My father was telling his druggist about my condition, and the druggist insisted that father take a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and have me try it, as it had helped his wife. I had given up, but to please father and mother, I commenced taking your medicine and in a week I had begun to feel better. When I passed through the Change of Life, I was taking the Vegetable Compound and I had no trouble of any kind."—Mrs. Anna McHenry, 1005 E. Plum St., Marshall, Illinois.

Another Woman Helped

Philadelphia, Penna.—Mrs. Caroline Nagy, of 2717 Sears St., in a recent letter to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., says that after her child was born she was in a very weak condition. She could not seem to regain her health and went to her mother for advice. She told her to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, as it had helped her when in like condition, and it has helped her mother also. So Mrs. Nagy started taking it. She felt better after taking the first bottle,—after taking six bottles her weakness and other troubles disappeared, and she is never done praising the Compound.

In some families the fourth generation is learning the merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 88

A Child's Laxative Which Mothers Can Rely On

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated infants and children had to be kept "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all children's little ills, he constantly advised mothers to give only a harmless laxative which would help to establish natural bowel "regularity."

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin mothers have a regulating laxative which they can depend upon whenever a child is constipated, bilious, feverish or sick from a cold, indigestion or sour stomach. All children love its pleasant taste.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine or write "Syrup Pepsin," Monticello, Illinois, for a FREE SAMPLE BOTTLE and just see for yourself how perfectly it cleanses and regulates the bowels of infants and children.

MORE POWER AND SUPERIOR QUALITY

DUMB-WAITER IS BIG KITCHEN AID

Stair-Climbing Can Be Reduced to Minimum.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

During many months of the year in northern climates, it is unnecessary to take ice, especially if a cool, clean, accessible place is available for storing foods that would ordinarily go into the refrigerator. Sometimes a window box answers the purpose, but in many farm homes the cellar is used because of its spaciousness and coolness. The chief drawback to a cellar storage room or cupboard is the fact that stair-climbing is invoked in transferring the things from below to the kitchen above. The illustration, which was taken by the United States Department of Agriculture in a Utah farm kitchen, shows the best way to reduce the stair-climbing to a minimum. By means of a dumb-waiter having several shelves, everything that is to go up or down can be moved at one time, and only one trip on the stairs is needed. Care should be taken, of course, to have the ropes and pulleys of this dumb-waiter so arranged that they will run very smoothly, to avoid spilling milk of other liquid foods.

The dumb-waiter in the picture is exceedingly well located with respect to the pass cupboard into the dining room and to the kitchen cabinet.

Perfect Cranberry Jelly Depends on Fine Points

Perfect cranberry jelly depends on several fine points, says the United States Department of Agriculture. First, use the right amount of hot water—two cupfuls to each quart of berries—no more; second, boil the cranberries rapidly until they burst, but no longer, or you will destroy the pectin that makes the jelly "jell"; third, press the fruit through a fine sieve rather than a colander so that seeds as well as skins are removed. Allow two cupfuls of sugar to each quart of cranberries, add it to the strained pulp, and cook until the jelly sheets from the spoon. Then mold it in small bowls holding about the right quantity for one meal. Cranberry jelly "weeps" or runs after it is cut, hence it is more attractive to place a fresh mold on the table at each serving. Cranberry jelly keeps well and it will save time to make up a supply ahead.

Prunes Rich in Iron

Prunes are especially rich in iron, and they are also a good source of calcium and phosphorus. All three of these are minerals that the body needs regularly and in generous quantities.

CHEESE SOUFFLE IS EASILY MADE

Delicious Combination of Cheese, Eggs and Milk.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Cheese souffle is a delicious combination of cheese and eggs, bread crumbs and milk, sufficiently hearty to take the place of meat and potatoes once in a while. Some homemakers have the idea that souffles are difficult to make and that only a French chef can turn out a perfect one. On the contrary a souffle is quite simple to make if one understands two or three points, that apply to almost all good cookery. Slow and thorough cooking in moderate heat is one of these points, states the United States Department of Agriculture.

You may know cheese souffle under the name of "cheese puff" or "cheese fondue;" the name does not matter especially. To make it you will need:

1 pint of milk
3 or 4 eggs
1¾ cupfuls of bread crumbs
¼ lb. American cheese
¾ teaspoonful of salt

Put the bread crumbs and the milk together in the double boiler, heat them to the scalding point. Grate the cheese or shave it into thin, small pieces and stir it into the hot milk and bread crumbs, but do not let it cook. Add the salt. Take this mixture from the heat and while it is cooling, beat the yolks and whites of the eggs separately, and butter a baking dish. The souffle will cook best in a good-sized earthenware or glass baking dish three or more inches deep. After the bread, milk and cheese mixture has cooled, stir in the beaten egg yolks and fold in the whites. The air beaten into the egg whites is what makes the souffle fluffy, so mix them in with the careful folding motion. Pour the mixture at once into the buttered baking dish and bake in a moderate oven for 35 to 45 minutes. Long, slow cooking is one of the secrets of making a perfect souffle. The moderate heat makes the air bubbles in the egg whites expand until the mixture is light and cooks it thoroughly so that even when a spoon is put into it for serving it does not collapse like a pricked balloon. That is what happens to a souffle, or omelet, or other similar egg dish that has been cooked too rapidly at too high a temperature. Souffles are not hard to make if one remembers this important point.

Valuable Food Material in Juice of Vegetables

For a long time the idea has prevailed that the juices in which vegetables are canned should be thrown away. This is entirely erroneous. With practically all vegetables, except tomatoes, a brine or sirup containing small amounts of salt or sugar or both is added to the solid vegetable in the process of canning for the purpose of seasoning the product, producing a well filled can and assisting in the proper cooking of the product. During the processing treatment, mineral matters, sugars and other soluble materials dissolve in the liquor. It is evident that the discarding of this liquid means the loss of valuable food material. So unless the solid pieces of vegetables are to be used for special purposes, such as the preparation of a salad, the throwing away of the juice represents a loss of the food material of the can.

Raw Onions Valuable

Like other fresh vegetables, raw onions are valuable for their minerals and vitamines and their bulk. The theory that onions or other foods are beneficial to the nerves has been exploded. It is now known that a well-balanced diet helps to keep all parts of the body healthy.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING WITH ROAST BEEF

Beef Prepared in Different Ways for Roasting.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

One of the best liked meats the world over is a roast of beef, and if you follow the old English custom you will serve with a "Yorkshire pudding," suggests the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. This pudding is sufficiently substantial and filling to take place of potato or other starch vegetables, and now when eggs are plentiful and reasonable in price is an excellent time to have it.

Yorkshire pudding may be prepared in the same pan with a roast of beef, but difficulty is experienced in making gravy when this is done, so it is considered simpler to cook it in a separate pan, using some of the drippings from the roast. The batter is similar to the mixture you use for popovers. The ingredients are: One cupful of milk, one cupful of flour, two eggs, one-fourth teaspoonful of salt. Beat the eggs until very light. In another bowl mix the salt and the flour and add the milk gradually, then the eggs. Pour the batter into a baking pan which contains some of the hot drippings from the roast. Bake the pudding for 20 to 30 minutes, basting it occasionally with the drippings. As it cooks, the pudding becomes delicately brown and crisp around the edges and puffs up in places. When ready to serve, cut it in squares and put it on the platter around the roast beef.

LIFE OF MRS. IDA LEIGHTY

Ida Lucinda, daughter of Isaiah and Elizabeth Davis, was born in Newville Township, DeKalb county, Indiana, on March 28, 1864 and departed this life October 21, 1926, at the age of 62 years, 6 months and 24 days. She has lived her entire life in DeKalb county, with the exception of a few years, when she resided at Kendallville, Ind.

Early in life she united with the Wesley Chapel M. E. Church, later in life she transfered her membership to the Church of Christ at Coburntown, Ind.

On September the 20th, 1881, she was united in marriage to Merrill K. Andress. To this union was born five children, three of them having preceded her in death. Ralph and Ruth dying in infancy, and Ivan at the age of 17½ years.

In November, 1918, she was again united in marriage to Malcolm E. Leighty, and for three years resided on a farm in Concord Township, 3½ miles east of St. Joe, Indiana. March 1, 1916 they moved to the DeKalb County Infirmary near Auburn, Mr. Leighty having been appointed Superintendent and Mrs. Leighty, Matron of the Home, she having filled this position until her death.

She was a kind and loving wife and mother, and leaves to mourn her death, her husband, two children, Ross V. Andress, of Elkhart, Indiana, Violet Thompson, of Kendallville, Ind., who has been with her mother the past eight months, during her illness; two step-children, Ethel W. Cheek, of Denver, Col., and Marguerite Perry, of Kalamazoo, Mich.; two grandchildren, Robert Bruce Thompson and Max David Andress and four step-grandchildren, William, Charlotte and Mary Marcella Cheek and Patricia Mae Perry; two sisters, Mrs. Mary E. Platter of Auburn, Ind., Mrs. Cornelia Griffith of South Bend, Ind., and a host of relatives and friends to mourn their loss.

The funeral was held from the Newville U. B. Church, Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock with burial in Newville cemetery. Rev. O. P. Givens, former pastor, delivered the sermon assisted by Rev. Hubbartt.

RIDENOUR FOR STATE REPRESENTATIVE

Russel R. Ridenour, ably served his district during the last legislature, and was the author of the present transfer law for school children. His aim and untiring effort during the last session was to assist in enacting only good and wholesome laws. He is a graduate of Tri-State College of Law of Angola, Indiana. After leaving college he entered the late World War as a Private and was discharged as a Second Lieutenant. Since that time he has practiced law at Auburn, Indiana, and has served as Deputy Prosecuting Attorney. He stands for better laws, the budget system, the elimination and abolishment of all useless commissions and offices, and if again elected will use his untiring effort to secure the enactment of fewer and better laws. He voted for the Wright Bone Dry Law and believes in the perpetuation of the 18th Amendment.

LIFE OF LEWIS HOWEY, JACKSON TOWNSHIP FARMER

Lewis Howey was born in Concord township, DeKalb county, Indiana, January 31, 1866. He attended the public schools in Concord township. On January 10, 1889, he was united in marriage to Dorcas Brown. To this union were born two children, Jennetta Provines of Jackson towship and Gladys Carper of Garrett, Indiana. He was preceded in death by his wife on September 4, 1901. His occupation was farming.

In 1904 he with his two young daughters moved to the farm in Jackson township which he owned and where he lived with his daughter, Jennetta Provines, at the time of his death.

He was a member of the Concord M. P. Church, a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, a member of the Concord Arbor of the Ancient Order of Gleaners, a life member of the Auburn Commercial club, also was an active worker in the DeKalb County Farm Bureau. In 1918 he was elected to the office of trustee in Jackson township. He took an unusual interest in the schools and road building and his administration of four years was of marked success.

He was a kind husband, an indulgent father, a good neighbor and will be greatly missed in the community in which he lived. During his last sickness, which covered a period of nearly one year he was a patient sufferer, departing this life on October 19, 1926, aged 60 years, 8 months and 18 days. He leaves two daughters, one granddaughter, Cleo Carper of Garrett, Ind., his aged mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Wasson of Jackson township, three half-brothers, Jerry Wasson of Spencerville, Wallace Wasson of St. Joe and Harry Wasson of Fort Wayne and many relatives and friends to mourn his departure.

Funeral services were held at Concord church Thursday. Burial was made at Roselawn cemetery, Auburn. Rev. C. H. Havens of Muncie, Ind., officiated assisted by Rev. McKnight of St. Joe.

THOS. C. STAFFORD FOR COUNTY ASSESSOR

Thos. C. Stafford, resident of Jackson Township, is seeking the office of County Assessor, as a Democratic candidate. He is well and favorably known in the county having been born in Jackson township and has taken a very active part in the affairs of our county in the past.

Mr. Stafford has been township assessor for six years and with this added experience, he feels that he is well qualified to fill the office which he is seeking. This is one county office that the tax payers are particularly interested in, and they especially feel that a man should know the value of our county.

Mr. Stafford is making his campaign upon his qualifications, and is asking voters for their support at the polls, if they feel that he is the man that can best render the service due the public. 43t1.

DEMOCRATS FIRE FIRST VOLLEY

The first guns of the local campaign were fired, when on Thursday night of last week, Waldemar E. Eickhoff, Democratic candidate for congress, and Samuel C. Cleland, Fort Wayne attorney, spoke to a small audience in the town hall.

Owing to the fact that Mr. Eickhoff was delayed on account of having accepted an invitation to speak at a labor organization meeting in Fort Wayne, before coming to St. Joe. Mr. Cleland talked from the Democratic viewpoint, until Mr. Eickhoff appeared. Mr. Cleland dwelt upon the Fordney McCumber measure, farm problems, etc., he closed his remarks by giving credence to the charges made by Adams; Vincennes editor, in regard to alleged frauds which were perpetrated, in which Governor Jackson owed his election. At the conclusion of Cleland's speech, Miles Baxter, county chairman of the Democratic organization, introduced the county candidates, each candidate rising as his name was called. Mr. Eickhoff's speech followed, this was mainly a resume of the talk which preceded, his own.

PRINCESS ZONKER ASKING FOR MONEY PROMISED HER

In a complaint filed in the DeKalb circuit court, Princess Zonker says Arthur Woodcox on June 12, 1925, gave her a note for $187 due August 15, 1925, another for $415 due Sept. 15 and a third for $190 due January 1, 1926.

To secure the notes a mortgage was executed on a tractor and set of plows, a disc harrow, a grain drill, a mowing machine, a gas engine, a wagon, a set of work harness, two horses, three cows, ⅗ three-fifths interest in 37 acres of growing corn, 32 acres of oats and a half interest in eight acres of sugar beets and forty-eight acres of hay, located in Concord and Wilmington townships.

The defendant, according to the complaint wanted to have a sale of his personal property. He still owed the plaintiff $200 and they entered into an agreement, she declares, by which the defendant was to pay this sum from the proceeds the sale. The sale was held last week. The plaintiff says the written agreement with reference to the $200 was presented to W. G. Erick, clerk of the sale, but payment was refused.

The court is asked to order Mr. Erick to pay the plaintiff from the funds of Woodcox in his possession. Fred Blaising is made a party defendant to answer for a lien that he claims to hold against the property sold.

FAVORABLE CANDIDATE FOR COUNTY TREASURER

Ward Jackman, republican candidate for county treasurer, made another visit in Spencer, Concord and Newville townships, Tuesday, making a canvass of the voters and making his candidacy known.

Ward Jackman was born in DeKalb County, 39 years ago and has been a resident of the county ever since. He is married and has one son. He was educated in the public schools of his community and graduated from the Fort Wayne Business Colege in 1907.

Since finishing school, he has been a farmer and dealer in live stock and has enjoyed marked success.

In 1919 he was elected secretary of The Waterloo Shippers Co., and in 1921 the office was combined with that of Manager, and he has been elected to fill the new office each year since. In this capacity he handles for the members of his company as much as $200,000.00 annually and the company has shown a very healthy growth under his management, especially during the past year.

For ten years Ward has been a member of the DeKalb County Council of Religious Education and is the oldest member of the council in point of service. He has not only been interested in the religious life of his community, but has been a worker and leader in all movements for the public good.

The same courteous, efficient handling of the office which the taxpayers have enjoyed during the past four years under Mrs. Weaver is assured if Ward is elected in November.

HICKSVILLE GETS FURNITURE PLANT

Ten Skilled Men Are Shifted From Antwerp Factory; Buy Building

Hicksville is to have a furniture factory.

The corporation authorized by the state Saturday, known as the Morton Ball Manufacturing Co., with capital stock of $20,000 and J. B. Johnson, Morton Ball, E. Johnson, R. E. Ball and J. E. Wasserman, as incorporators has bought th Charles H. Geller building, together with all the machinery, for $5,000.

Workmen are now putting the building in shape to commence operations within a few days. Ten men skilled in furniture making will be brought here from the J. B. Johnson factory at Antwerp and twenty local men will be employed at once to start the to increase the number to one hundred as soon as possible.

Several Hicksville citizns have taken a financial interest in the enterprise.

Local Headquarters for the Famous Red Top STEEL FENCE POSTS

RIGHT here is the place to get those Red Top Steel Fence Posts you see advertised in your farm papers.

This Red Top is a proved post—tested by farmers in thousands of fence lines. It's got a mighty good record right around here. The studded Red Top is extra strong without a weak spot in it. It has a long life. You can drive over 200 of them in a day with the One-Man Driver. The Handy Fasteners that come free with the posts are made so as to hold the wire securely, thus doing away with restapling and restretching.

The Red Top post is guaranteed by the maker. Their guarantee is worth one hundred cents on the dollar. We are authorized to make all adjustments. So we put our own personal endorsement and guarantee on every Red Top we sell.

It's just that kind of an article we like to handle in all lines, the leader in its field. One of the main points we look at in our buying is to get the makes of goods that give our customers the most value for the money. We don't expect to prosper unless you get a good big dollar's worth for every dollar you spend.

Drop in and see us when you're in town. Prices are mighty reasonable just now on fencing materials and many other special items.

Jackson Township Murder

Disclosed when Forrest Farver failed to Return Home. Lived 4 Miles West of St. Joe. Detailed Report of Proceedures.

THURSDAY'S EVENTS
Day's progress given in detail as given by Auburn Evening-Star, in the greatest murder case in DeKalb County.

The mysterious disappearance of Forrest Farver, 42, of Waterloo, a former Jackson township farmer and an employe of the Auburn Rubber Co., is the subject of inquiry by the law officers of DeKalb county.

There seems no doubt that Farver met with foul play and a neighbor, Charles McInturf, was taken into custody late Wednesday on suspicion of having guilty knowledge. Mrs. Laila Farver, wife of the missing man, was brought from her home at Waterloo to Auburn Thursday morning for questioning.

Farver has not been seen since Tuesday forenoon, when he went to his farm, located a half mile north and a half mile east of Rehoboth church. McInturf's home is three-quarters of a mile away on the Solomon Shearer farm, of which he has been the tenant. McInturf had some corn planted on the Farver place on the shares. He admits that he went to the Farver farm with his wagon Tuesday, but declares he did not see Farver. However, there are evidences of a murder and the circumstances point strongly towards McInturf.

McInturf is about forty-five. His wife died two and a half years ago. His oldest daughter recently married Ralph Peters and they live on South Cedar street in Auburn. McInturf has two young daughters and a boy at home.

Farver Quit Farming

Farver and his wife were married fifteen years ago. Her maiden name was Koons and her home was in Wood county, O., where her aged mother still lives. There are four children in the Farver family. Two of them are twin sons, aged fourteen. The other children are girls, aged ten and two years respectively. Farver was known as a hard working man and he made money farming for some years. Then conditions on the farm became unsatisfactory and a year or more ago he began to work at the Auburn Rubber Co., making the trip to and from the factory in his automobile. He had not been working recently, but expected to return to his job next Monday.

McInturf has been making visits to the Farver place for three or four years. He came often for some time and frequently was there during Farver's absence, it is said. Mrs. Farver admits he came often and stayed for quite a while, but says that sometimes he was after farming tools or to do some work. She denies that he ever made improper proposals to her. She says her husband talked with her about McInturf's visits to her and that she advised her husband to tell McInturf to stay away.

Farver, according to his wife, said it didn't look good for McInturf to be coming so often, but that he did not want to "make a fuss" about it. He didn't like to say anything to McInturf about it. Finally, however he did speak to McInturf and told him he should stay away from the house, she declares. Mrs. Farver says she did not hear these conversations, but that she did not believe her husband and McInturf quarreled.

Mrs. Farver says her husband wanted to move from the farm to Waterloo because of the bad roads he had to travel in driving from his farm to work in Auburn. It was reported to the sheriff that Farver had stated that he wanted to leave the farm in order to get away from McInturf. Mrs. Farver says that McInturf told her one day last week that her husband told some one that when he got his family moved to Waterloo he intended to leave them. Mrs. Farver said she asked Forrest about that and he denied ever making such a statement or having such intentions.

Talked Behind Barn

Mrs. Farver said that soon after this McInturf was at the Farver farm and she told her husband to tell McInturf to come into the house on the pretense that she wanted to give him some cookies that she had just baked. McInturf came in, and Farver was there also. Mrs. Farver says she expected her husband to say something to McInturf about the story McInturf had told her, but Farver said nothing and the subject was not discussed. Farver and McInturf left the house and had a talk behind the barn, but Mrs. Farver said she does not know what took place between them.

The Farver family moved to Waterloo last Friday, occupying a Leas property on Center street. Farver returned to his farm Monday to do some work and he talk to McInturf at that time. He told McInturf he intended to return the next day.

On Tuesday morning Farver left home early with a one-horse wagon. He drove to Auburn, where he saw Herman L. Brown of the Auburn American Security Co., with reference to borrowing some money. He took a note along with him to get securities and proceeded to his farm, arriving there about 10 o'clock. He went to the woods and loaded some poles that he intended to use for firewood. Then he drove to the barn and put two sacks of potatoes into the wagon. He evidently then sat down by the granary to eat his dinner, having brought his dinner pail along.

Farver failed to return home Tuesday night. The next morning his wife telephoned to his sister, Mrs. Homer Bower, who lives on Pearl street in Auburn. When Mrs. Bower learned of the situation she and her husband went to Waterloo, got Mrs. Farver and they all proceeded to the farm. They arrived there about 8:30 and looked until noon for Farver without success. They went to the Daniel Jetmore home nearby for dinner and Mr. Jetmore telephoned to Sheriff Wm. G. Morr.

Ground Blood-Soaked

Deputy Sheriff Arden Morr went to the place at once and he was joined later by the sheriff. The officers and neighbors made a thorough search for Farver, but

CELEBRATES 80TH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Jacob Baltz, 80, former Spencerville blacksmith, celebrated his birthday last Friday. For a man of his age he is very active and enjoys remarkable health, barring the physical infirmities accompanying one of so many years. To give you an idea of his activities for the past summer he cares for and milks two cows and delivers milk to his customers; made five loads of alfalfa hay; made 242 gallons of cider; picked 25 bushels of apples; cared for and harvested four acres of corn; cared for large truck patch; raised 25 bushels of potatoes; has ten tame rabbits to care for; helped make 25 gallons of apple butter and is now fattening a hog for his winter meat besides the regular duties of his small farm.

THANKS TO VOTERS

Election is over, and I wish to thank all who gave their support, and I also wish Mr. O. K. Shull a successful term as trustee of Concord Township.

MILLINERY IS MORE ORNATE; PARIS SPONSORS OSTRICH BOA

THAT note of elegance and elaboration which so characterises our costume modes this season is also finding its way into millinery. It is taking some persuasion on the part of Dame Fashion to jog us out of the lethargic state of being content to wear a simple little shape to almost the exclusion of millinery which is real millinery. However, the signs of the times tell us that the days of our complacency are over; from now on orders straight from headquarters demand that, at least for dressy occasions, we wear dressy millinery.

So it is that opulence, achieved through artful color effects and crafty handwork, is bespoken throughout the realm of millinery. Which accounts for the dressy element having entered into the designing of the charming headwear shown in this picture.

That felt can assume the airs of a dress hat if it wants to is convincingly proved in the first hat shown. Briefly described it is a beige shape of exceeding great elegance cut by deft hands in irregular points and so positioned at the crown as to reveal an inlay of nasturtium velours. The edges are outlined with gold paint and there is a cunning little feather spattered with gold which doesn't show in the picture.

The wee hat at the top center is all agliter with gilt stitchery on velvet ribbon, the same alternated with rows of grosgrain ribbon, the entire accenting a complicated handling.

The clever little shape with a deep cuff at the back shown to the right at the top is of velvet. It also is elaborated with whimsical embroidery which combines exotic coloring with twinkling metal thread. One of the important millinery items this season is the velvet hat enlivened with lavish stitchery.

Pictured in the center of this collection of millinery confections is a large dinner hat of black velvet made strikingly handsome with crown drape of gold mesh cloth, which is repeated in the shirred facing which frames the face bewitchingly.

Lastly is shown a model which displays the new slant-back draped crown. The passementerie across the front is beaded in oriental coloring.

Noted for costume chic is la Parisienne. One of the reasons why is that the French woman is endowed with the gift of sensing how, when, where and what accessories to wear for a perfect ensemble.

Just now a favorite theme with milady of France is the ostrich boa or ruff. Nor is she adopting the feather boa exclusively for evening wear. On the contrary it has become to her almost as an essential to the completion of her daytime costume.

Group of Autumn Hats.

How charming a note the ostrich boa or, rather, ruff adds to the autumn appearance of madame and mademoiselle is told in this picture. The ostrich collarette to the left, worn with the black lace and georgette frock, is a dark rust shade, while the one on the figure to the right indulges in the new ombre shading, in this instance grading from dark green to pistachio with a presence of deep red flues as well. Note the smart felt hats, for if not a conspicuously draped velvet turban, then the French woman of fashion wears felt.

Not only in neckpieces for daytime wear, but in every conceivable interpretation, has ostrich entered the style picture. Feather boas, the long willowy type in two-tone combinations, are favored for dressier occasion. The newest item of all in fashionable dress is the gold ostrich evening neckpiece.

Styles in ostrich neckpieces for street wear include chokers, ruffs and some of the longer types. Some are also shown with ribbon streamers. Two-tone effects are the favorite, such as Chanel red with bright red, dark blue and Copenhagen, jade and jungle green, also black with white and cocoa with beige. The fact that the modern feather neckpiece is processed to resist dampness adds to its value and interest for practical wear.

HOW THE PILGRIM MOTHER

Kept Her Family in Good Health

A statue to the Pilgrim Mother was recently unveiled at Plymouth Rock, Mass. Through her we honor every pioneer woman who endured privation and hardships that a nation might live. Shoulder to shoulder with her husband she built a home in the wilderness and reared her sturdy sons and daughters. She cooked and sewed. She spun and wove for her growing family and when they were ill, she brewed potent remedies from roots and herbs—such roots and herbs as are now used in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

A Massachusetts woman writes: "I was all run-down, with no ambition. I was tired all the time. Sometimes I would be in bed two or three days at a time, and the doctor would have to give me something to quiet me. A friend told me about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I have had wonderful results from it. I felt better after taking the second bottle, and I am never without it in the house now. I have told lots of people about it, and they say it helps them, too. I am willing to answer letters from women asking about the Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. J. W. The WATER BEARER

"Quite right, Baxter." Cox's manner was crisp. "Mr. Warner is entirely in our confidence. Sit down."

"Oh, very well. I take it that Mr. Warner knows all about my interest in my friend Thompson in connection with this matter. An excellent engineer, I believe?"

Neither Cox nor Caleb answered. Baxter drew a long envelope from his inside pocket with a bit of a flourish. Cox's eyes fixed upon it. He fancied that this was the boomerang.

"This company has got to have Hermanos valley for its reservoir, Hermanos canyon at its head for its dam site. Never mind where I got the information. There's a model in your directors' room that proves my assertion." For a moment he faltered. Cox and Caleb had exchanged glances. Baxter seemed suspicious of them.

"I've got the privilege of sale on that property," he went on. "For one year, and thereafter until revoked by the party of the first part. Now deceased. It is an option-contract. Binding on the heirs and assigns of the late Captain Clinton. I'm going to offer it to the company at a fair price—with the stipulation already stated to you concerning Mr. Thompson. Here's the agreement. The price to me, as you will see, is one hundred and twenty-five dollars an acre. My price to you, one hundred and fifty. A fair profit and a fair price. No chance for condemnation proceedings." He handed the document to Cox, who ran swiftly over the two pages, refolded it and passed the paper to Caleb.

Caleb's face hardened as he read. The essence of the contract, as it applied to the situation, was that in it Baxter was given permission to sell the land without reservation as to its uses, for any purposes, without mention of the ranch-house—or of the little cemetery where Clinton himself now lay buried.

"That's my hand," said Baxter. "Your play, Cox. But this thing has got to be settled immediately. Or—I go to Oakville."

Cox took the paper refolded by Caleb as the latter laid it on the desk. And he handed it back to Baxter.

"Doesn't interest us," he said.

Baxter's jaw sagged. He checked a "What?" by biting his underlip as Cox went on:

"So far as the Crystal Springs Water company is concerned, so far as any water company is concerned, that carbon is not worth the paper it is typed on."

Baxter had braced himself and managed a laugh as he leaned forward.

"I'm not here to bluff," he said. "Why isn't it?"

"I'll tell you, if you insist." Cox spoke as if he had already dismissed the matter and talked only out of bored politeness. "You got information about our project, Warner's preliminary prospectus and the model in the next room, through leaks in this office. There are leaks in every office. We guard against 'em. Warner found out long ago that the bed rock, as the side formations, in Hermanos canyon are not structurally able to support an impounding dam.

"He gave up the idea of that dam site, but we didn't bother to change the model. The details of Warner's amended plans were submitted to us and we approved of them. But those details, transcribed by a man whom I can absolutely trust—my own secretary—were not filed where anyone might get a look at them—as was the case with the original prospectus. They were filed back of you, Baxter, in that steel cabinet, here in my own room, under a key that I alone hold. No leaks from that, my son. I repeat, we are not in the least interested in your option."

The boomerang had struck its wielder.

Baxter looked from one to the other, a muscle twitching high up in one cheek. His glance lingered venomously on Caleb, who had outwitted him.

"So that's your joker card, is it? Well, I've got one to match it. Cut this out." He put the paper away, and stood up. "Don't forget I've got enough information to interest Oakville. I've got an idea they'll block your project. You won't be able to buy up your lands on the quiet. I'll attend to that even if Oakville doesn't take hold. Though I fancy they will and pay me for the information, too. I'll put the ranchers wise and I'll boost the price of Caliente Sink and all the watershed until the cost will swamp your scheme at the outset." He whirled on Caleb with a snarl. "And you'll lose your big stake and your job at the same time, Warner, for all your cleverness. Good morning—and be d—d to both of you!"

Baxter, starting for the exit, stopped short as it opened abruptly. He stared and faltered as Mary Morgan came swiftly in and shut the door, leaning against it. Her face was white save for two spots of red, her blue eyes were menacing as she fixed them upon Baxter and her breast heaved tumultuously while she took some papers from inside her blouse and held them tight gripped.

Baxter made a sudden move toward the girl, his eyes fixed on the papers she held as if he had suddenly become suspicious of them. She held out one hand against him.

"Mr. Warner," she said, her breath coming short, "please give these papers to Mr. Cox."

Caleb took them wonderingly, though he sensed the culmination of an act in the drama between Baxter and this girl, a scene in which he was on for a purpose, together with Cox. She stood fast in front of the door, her arms spread, her fingers clutching the outside of the frame on either side. Baxter strode toward her.

"This doesn't interest me," he said. "Get out of my road."

"No!" The monosyllable was an explosion of loathing and contempt. Baxter recoiled a little before the girl. The blonde stenographer was an embodiment of hatred and of determination.

"Not until Mr. Cox has read those papers and heard what I am going to say."

Caleb looked at Cox and the latter nodded slightly in understanding.

"All right, Miss Morgan," said Caleb. "You needn't stand by the door. Mr. Baxter will stay."

She looked at him and read his face, then moved away a little while Caleb lounged against the door panels and Baxter retreated before the fury that the girl manifested. Cox looked at his transformed stenographer through half-closed lids. He had not yet read the papers.

"I don't imagine you hear office gossip, Mr. Cox," she began, "but almost everyone in your office knows that I am going to have a baby. This—Baxter—is its father. He has promised a score of times to marry me or to give me money enough to go away. He preferred the latter. And his promises were like himself, worthless!"

Baxter looked away from her scorn, first at Cox, sphinxlike in his chair, then at Caleb guarding the door with an air of willing readiness to oppose his exit. He had lost his poise. He cringed under the whip of her words and attitude. Then he tried to brave it out, with a sneer that lacked definition.

"This sort of stuff . . ." commenced Baxter.

"Keep quiet." The order from Cox was so brusque that the lesser spirit quailed. "Go on, Miss Morgan."

"Baxter came to me," continued the girl, "some time ago with a form of option that he wanted me to type. In it Captain Clinton agreed to sell for farming purposes only; he reserved the ranch-house and some few acres from all sale. It was to be typed in duplicate and I made an extra carbon, which I kept. You have it there. I kept it for reference. But when he brought me a blank form the day before yesterday, with the name of Captain Clinton and a witness already signed, when he asked me to type in the manuscript text that he supplied and to do it so carefully that it would look as if the signatures had been naturally made, in spaces coming at the right distance from the conclusion of the typing, it was not hard to know that something was wrong—that Baxter had practiced those signatures on blank sheets until he had got them perfect. This option had no reservations. He did not want a carbon of that—no copy of it will be found among Captain Clinton's papers. But I made a carbon, the second paper that you hold, Mr. Cox."

Cox had glanced over the documents as the girl made her points and now he laid them down.

"You suspected the signatures were forgeries? You knew Captain Clinton was dead?" he asked.

"Yes." She spoke half defiantly. "I knew that. I have done more than that. I gave Baxter information I got in the office here. I did it all because, up till then, I wanted him to marry me. He swore that he would if I typed this last contract. He said it would bring him in a lot of money, that the signatures were genuine. I didn't challenge that because . . ."

For a moment she wavered but caught herself up.

"But I didn't trust him. That is why I made the second carbon. When I asked him to go with me and get our license, he laughed at me. Then I did accuse him of forgery. He said that if it was, Clinton would not rise from the dead to dispute it, that no one could detect it, that the witness only signed with a cross and could not read what was in the option. And that I was just as deep in it as he was. I suppose it was criminal. I have resigned my position here. I have played false to the company. You can do whatever you want with me. I do not mind punishment as long as he has to share it."

Baxter winced. The girl was in deadly earnest.

"How about it, Baxter?" asked Cox.

"A mess of lies. She's cooked it up because I won't marry her. And I wouldn't because I am as doubtful of the paternity of the child as she affects to be of the authenticity of the option."

"Oh!" The girl stood rigid, her hands changed to talons. Baxter took a swift step back. Caleb came from the door, his fists doubled. Then Cox, coming out from behind his desk in rapid movement, caught her as she tottered and helped her to a chair, where she collapsed, sobbing hysterically.

"Both those options are genuine," blustered Baxter. "I defy you to prove them otherwise. I got the second one from Clinton after my land deal fell through. He was anxious to realize on his estate."

"You admit the two documents?" Cox's words were crisp.

"Certainly. And now we'll leave Miss Morgan and my personal affairs out of it. If you haven't anything more to say, our proposition stands as it did. You'll hear from Oakville, or from me through the press. You can't bully me, Cox."

Cox leveled his forefinger at Baxter, his eyes steely, his words driven home like the blows of a hammer.

"If you say anything to Oakville, to the press, to anyone, concerning the affairs of this company, if you annoy in any way this young lady, I'll start something. Baxter, that you will find it very hard to finish. You know me, and I know you. You're clever but you're not sound. The witness to these options, Padilla, may be illiterate, but I fancy he'll remember that he did not sign two papers in the same day. You forgot to change your date, Baxter, when you altered the text. We won't even need Miss Morgan's testimony. And, if I have to get after you, my son, I won't hesitate to bring any influence to bear that I possess. You're trailing to a smash fast enough on your own account, but you'll travel a lot more swiftly if I get busy. Now, you grasshopper, hop out of this office!"

He turned on his heel. Baxter slunk past Caleb to the door. His jauntiness had nothing left but a whisper. But that was virulent as the hiss of a snake to Caleb.

"I'm not through with you yet." And his face, his eyes, were not those of a sane man.

Mary Morgan had smothered her hysteria and stood by the desk, awaiting judgment.

"You spoke of going away, Miss Morgan," said Cox in a voice that surprised Caleb by its gentleness, as it did the girl. She looked at him hesitatingly, wiping her eyes.

"I meant to go east, until it was over," she said. "A friend," she did not glance at Caleb, "furnished me the money. But I will stay here where you can find me. I should rather not leave California—only . . ."

"You don't have to. Though we shan't need you in this affair, Baxter's through. After it is all over, come to me, or write me and I shall be glad to help you to a position. With the Capitol Land and Irrigation company at Sacramento, in all probability. They will always be glad of service as capable as yours. You have managed to render us a service that quite wipes out anything else you may have done foolishly."

Bewildered, she tried to express thanks.

"That will be quite all right, Miss Morgan. Don't forget to apply to me. And now you are excused for the day. You can go out through my door to the elevator. I'll have Harry get your things."

Caleb had imagined Cox just but not lightly turning to the side of mercy. Still the girl had effectively disposed of Baxter. And she had in all likelihood saved Caleb a hundred thousand dollars, besides his salaried position. After she had gone Cox turned from the window.

"Poor little devil," he said. "Baxter made a fool of her. I've got a girl at home, Warner, just about her age. She hasn't had to earn her living, lack for pretty things to wear or her full share of fun and good times. This girl may turn out all right, with a helping hand. She has spunk. As for Baxter, he hopped too far. She's cleverer than he is. He's got a chrome streak down his back; he's zebra-striped with yellow when it comes to a showdown. D—d shame the girl hasn't got a brother. He deserves a good licking."

Caleb, remembering the fight on the bridge, knowing Baxter's financial straits, fancied he had not been without punishment. That final threat he dismissed as idle.

"He nearly had us," wound up Cox. "Publicity—or Oakville—would have ruined our plans. But he's hopped for the last time in my meadow."

Pointers for Men of Inventive Turn

Talking movies and a hat band that doesn't get streaked by the rain are two of the world's needs not yet supplied, according to the British Institute of Patentees. The institute has just issued its booklet on "What's Wanted" as a guide to inventors who may be slightly uncertain as to what to invent.

Many of the items listed have been suggested by the war office, the air ministry, post office and other British government departments. Industrial concerns have also offered suggestions of inventions which would be valuable to manufacturers and artisans.

The list includes a noiseless airplane, better motor car headlights, processes for instantaneous color photography, elimination of rust and transmission of speech by light; also a method of conveying speech directly and readably to paper.

Suspicious of Columbus

Columbus had returned to Spain bringing news of a wonderful, new land across the sea.

"How much shall I write on it?" queried the maritime reporter of the Cadiz Evening Bulletin.

"Don't write anything," replied the city editor. "Let Columbus pay for his advertising if he wants any. It's probably a real estate promotion scheme."—New York University Medley.

Lesson for October 31

THE EVILS OF STRONG DRINK

LESSON TEXT—Prov. 23:29-35.

GOLDEN TEXT—At last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Learning to be Temperate.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Control of the Appetite.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Alcoholic Beverages Hurtful to the Individual and Society.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Light Wine and Beer a Menace.

I. Woes of Those Who Indulge in Wine (vv. 29, 30).

No more graphic description of the evils of the winebibber has ever been given. It portrays in the most impressive manner the miseries that attach to the drunkard's life.

1. The awful pain which causes one to cry out, "Oh!"

Many indeed are the pains which men suffer because of strong drink. Bodily ills innumerable can be traced to its evil influence.

2. The bitter remorse which causes one to cry out, "Alas!".

Many are the expressions of bitter regret which come daily from the lips of the drunkard. Sometimes it is the sorrow of disgrace, loss of manhood and self-respect. Sometimes it is the sorrow of poverty of the individual and his family clothed in rags and half starved. Sometimes it is the sorrow of following a broken-hearted wife to her grave and seeing his children scattered among strangers.

3. Contention, strife and quarreling.

Much of the fighting among men is directly caused by their passions being inflamed by strong drink. The drunken man is always ready for a fight. He takes offense as well as gives offense. He not only has these from without, but he has struggles within. His conscience and his appetite are warring with each other.

4. Babblings and complainings.

The winebibber complains of everything, ill-luck, broken fortune, ruined health, loss of friends, of fate and of God.

5. Wounds without a cause.

These are wounds which might have been avoided from fights in which a sober man would not have engaged and from accidents which are purely the result of intoxication.

6. Redness of eyes.

This has reference to the blood-shot eyes of the tippler which ruins and dims his vision.

All these woes come upon those who tarry long at wine (v. 30).

II. The Attitude Enjoined (v. 31).

Look not at it. Do not put yourself in the way of temptation. The only safe attitude toward strong drink is total abstinence, and the only sure way of total abstinence is not to even look at it.

III. The Drunkard's Bitter End (vv. 32-35).

1. Acute miseries (v. 32). "It biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

Strong drink, like the poison of the serpent, permeates the whole system and ends in the most fatal consequences, the bitterest sufferings and death.

2. The perversion of the moral senses (v. 33).

(1) This excitement causes the eyes to behold strange things. This denotes the fantastic images which are produced on the brain of the drunkard. Even when delirium tremens does not result, there are awful fancies which are beyond the possibility of realization. Since carnal lust always comes with wine drinking, it is no doubt true, as the Authorized Version has it, "Thine eyes shall behold strange women."

(2) "Thine heart shall utter perverse things." His moral sense being perverted, his utterances partake of the same. He tells lies, his words cannot be believed.

3. He is insensible to danger (v. 34).

The drunkard is unsteady. His brain reels to and fro, he is foolhardy, even as one who would lie in the top of a ship's mast where there is the greatest danger of falling off.

4. He is insensible to pain (v. 35).

The drunkard is utterly ignorant of what happens to him while under the influence of strong drink. The drunkard has many bruises and wounds for which he cannot account. He did not realise when he received them.

5. His abject bondage (v. 35).

After all his sufferings, sorrow and disappointment he goes on as a bond-slave to follow the ways of sin.

6. Hell at last, for no drunkard shall enter the Kingdom of Heaven (I Cor. 6:10).

The Rock of Ages

A sailor in a shipwreck was once thrown upon a small rock, and clung to it, in great danger, until the tide went down. "Say, Joe," asked his friends after the rescue, "didn't you shake with fear?" "Yes," replied Joe, "but the rock didn't." Christ is the Rock of Ages.—Sabbath Reading.

MEAT AND OTHER DISHES

Tongue, which has been lightly corned, if put to cook in water to cover for several hours, then skinned and simmered in the following sauce or baked in it, will be found delightful eating. Take a pint of good strong beef stock, a teaspoonful of worcestershire sauce, a few drops of tabasco, half a cupful of seeded raisins; pour over the tongue and cook for an hour, basting often. Remove the tongue to a hot platter and pour the sauce around it. Serve hot.

Veal With Vegetables.—Take a good thick slice of veal from the leg, brown it in a hot pan with two tablespoonfuls of butter, turning often to brown without burning. Now cover with a layer of chopped carrots, onion, turnip and potato; sprinkle with chopped celery and pour over it the browned gravy slightly thickened. Bake slowly until tender in a moderate oven.

Steak may be browned and cooked with onions, tomatoes, mushrooms or served with baked bananas in butter and lemon juice. We are prone to serve certain foods in certain ways and we often think we are tired of the foods when it is the way that they are served of which we tire.

Apple fritters are always enjoyed. They may be served with a sauce as dessert or on the plate with the dinner when pork is served.

Tuna Fish in Peppers.—Cut the stem ends from six peppers, remove the seeds and veins and soak in cold water for an hour. Drain and pack the following mixture into the peppers: To two cupfuls of tuna fish, add four eggs slightly beaten, one cupful each of milk and bread crumbs, season with salt and pepper. Sprinkle with buttered crumbs and bake in a hot oven or until thoroughly hot.

Veal With Spaghetti.—Cut two pounds of veal from the shoulder in small-sized pieces to serve, brown in hot fat, add two sliced onions, a tablespoonful of salt, a dash of red pepper, a tablespoonful of sugar, a can of tomatoes and a pound of spaghetti. Cook slowly three hours on the back of the stove or in the fireless cooker. Mutton with carrots and peas is good cooked this way.

More Good Things.

Now that the chestnut season is at hand one may have many delectable dishes. Here is a delicacy which is expensive when bought, but may be prepared at home. Boil the chestnuts after removing the shell and blanching, until tender. Prepare a rich lemon sauce, drop them into it and put into a can and seal. This may be used in various dishes as garnishes.

Boiled chestnuts with celery and chicken make delicious salads. An apple or two may be added to make the salad go farther, without spoiling its tastiness.

Bran Bread.—Take four cupfuls of wheat bran, two cupfuls of whole wheat flour, three-fourths of a cupful of New Orleans molasses, a teaspoonful of salt, a teaspoonful of soda, two cupfuls of sweet milk, two tablespoonfuls of shortening, a few raisins, and bake one hour.

Imperial Rice Pudding.—Soak one-third of a box of gelatin in one-half cupful of water. Put three cupfuls of milk into a double boiler; when boiling, stir in one-half cupful of rice, a half teaspoonful of salt and cook until the rice is tender. Now add one-half cupful of sugar, remove from the heat, add a teaspoonful of vanilla and the gelatin. When cold add a pint of whipped cream and put into a mold. Serve unmolded, very cold.

Eastern Sandwiches.—Put through a meat chopper one sour apple pared and quartered, one red Spanish pepper, one sweet green pepper, one Neufchatel cheese. Add a half teaspoonful of salt, a pinch of powdered sugar and spread on slices of buttered bread.

Baked Bananas en Casserole.—Place peeled and halved bananas in a casserole with a sauce of melted butter, lemon juice and sugar poured over them. Bake, basting occasionally, and serve with half a glass of currant jelly poured over them at the last. Serve with broiled steaks.

Overdoing?

Harry, Worry and Overwork Bring Heavy Strain.

MODERN life throws a heavy burden on our bodily machinery. The eliminative organs, especially the kidneys, are apt to become sluggish. Retention of excess uric acid and other poisonous waste often gives rise to a dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning perfectly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. More and more people are learning to assist their kidneys by the occasional use of Doan's Pills—a stimulant diuretic. Ask your neighbor!

Don't Rub Your Eyes If They Burn

Why do you rub your eyes? You rub them because they itch, burn, feel sticky, or are otherwise uncomfortable. The hands are not always clean which is a good reason why you should not rub them. Discomfort in the eyes or lids is almost invariably due to congestion. That is, there is too much blood there. To rub the eyes is to increase the blood supply. If your hands are cold you rub them to "improve the circulation." That means you rub them to get more blood into your hands. For the same reason rubbing your eyes will cause more blood to rush to tissues which are already overcrowded with blood. The most common cause for congestion is overuse or improper use if the eyes. Reading too long or reading by bad light will produc it. Long use of the eyes at sewing or embroidery will cause congestion. Nature is very kind to us and she will permit almost unlimited use of the eyes, provided they are normal as to sight. The general vigor has everything to do with the eye vigor. It is amazing what a great proportion of persons have defective vision of one form or another. The first thing to be thought of if the eyes itch and burn or give other signs of congestion is to see what is wrong with the vision. It is possible glasses will help. Let us examine your eyes and determine if glasses will help—if they will we make them to fit your eyes and your pocket book. Give us a trial.

ets were turned wrong side out. McInturf claimed he did not turn the pockets. He was asked what became of Farver's pocketbook. It contained $16 in currency and a $25 check given to Farver by Walter Baker, the Concord merchant, last Monday, the day before the murder. Mr. Baker had bought a cow from Farver.

Denies Stealing Money

McInturf insisted he did not see the pocketbook. He had $13 in his pocket when he was taken into custody, Wednesday, but he said this was his own money. He led the officers into the barn that he used for a garage. There he lifted a box containing a hen's nest and pulled out a number of letters and other private papers of no particular value that belonged to Farver. McInturf said those papers fell from Farver's pocket. It was in this garage that McInturf placed Farver's body in his automobile and hauled it away, to be tossed headfirst into an abandoned well on the Curtis Watt farm a short distance east in Spencer township.

McInturf then took the lead in a walk over the path that was made when Farver's body was dragged from the scene of the murder. The trail led to a pasture field 130 rods from McInturf's house. There McInturf pictured the fight that culminated in Farver's death. He said he had gone to Farver's place Tuesday morning to dig potatoes and that he and Farver got into a quarrel over his attentions to Mrs. Farver. He said Farver chased him across the field, throwing chunks of wood at him. He tried to show a place on the back of his head where he said Farver hit him with a club.

McInturf then said that he wheeled on Farver and pointed his gun at him. Farver, he said, began to run and McInturf pulled the trigger, striking Farver in the back. Farver fell. McInturf said he then reached over and fired two more bullets into Farver's head. He said Farver struggled as he laid there on the sod, but he was helpless. McInturf dragged him a short distance over a wire fence into the woods, where he laid him under a tree. A pool of blood was found where Farver's life ebbed away.

Shows No Emotion

McInturf described the death scene without apparently any emotion. He declared anyone of those in the crowd would have done the same thing. He insisted that Farver threatened to kill him and chased him with clubs. Some one standing there asked the man in shackles which tree he wanted to be strung up to. He smiled grimly as he answered that he guessed it didn't make any difference. Asked what punishment he thought he ought to get, he replied that he didn't know; that he shot only when he had to. But, he said, he didn't know what he was doing and that he wouldn't do it again.

Going along the trail, McInturf was asked if he thought it was all right for him to have become so friendly with another man's wife. He answered that he didn't know; that the woman came into the fields and to his house to see him; that she was in love with him, and he with her. He denied they intended to get married after Farver was out of the way. He said he already had four children at home and didn't know what he would do with the woman and four more children.

McInturf said he dragged Farver's body by taking hold of his feet. He admitted that the body was hard for him to handle.

The McInturf children had gone to the home of a great uncle, Joseph Wyatt, a short distance east of their home. McInturf was taken there by the officers so he could see them and tell them to bring some clothes to him at the jail.

42 Years of Age

Mr. Farver was born in 1884 and besides his wife is survived by four children, John, Jacob, Luella and Carrie Ellen. He was the son of Mr. and Mrs. John Farver who moved from DeKalb county to Fremont, Steuben county, about a year ago where they now reside.

Mr. Farver was born on a farm in Jackson township and has always followed farming until he recently secured a position in the Auburn Rubber Co. factory.

After the body was found it was take to the Dilgard Funeral home to await funeral arrangements.

SATURDAY'S EVENTS

Day's progress given in detail as given by Auburn Evening-Star, in the greatest murder case in DeKalb County.

Judge W. P. Endicott in the DeKalb circuit court Saurday ordered the grand jury of the October term of court convened in session Wednesday morning at 9 o'clock for the purpose of invatigating the murder of Forrest Farver of Jackson township.

It was thought at first that the grand jury would be called for Monday, but the day was changed to Wednesday.

The work of the grand jury will be in charge of Capt. H. C. Springer, prosecuting attorney and his deputy, Howard S. Grimm. Witnesses who will appear before the jury are expected to include Sheriff Wm. G. Morr, his deputy, Arden Morr, Coroner Amos N. Adams, Charles Davis, chief of police of Auburn, Ray and Jay Dilgard, undertakers, Curt Watt, Herman Peters, Dr. A. W. Hines and the slain man's widow, Lalia Farver.

It is expected that the grand jury will return an indictment of first degree murder against Charley McInturf. As McInturf claims he shot Farver in self-defense, it is assumed that he will plead not guilty to the charge. A trial then would be necessary. If he pleads guilty, the court could sentence him to life imprisonment unless the state insisted upon the death penalty, in which event a jury woud be called to fix the punishment.

McInturf has been told that he is entitled to legal counsel, but has taken no steps to retain attorneys. It is doubtful if he has the money or the resources to pay lawyers and if this is found to be the case the court will appoint legal counsel for him.

MONDAY'S EVENTS

Day's progress given in detail as given by Auburn Evening-Star, in the greatest murder case in DeKalb County.

Despite Charley McInturf's insistence that he hid Forrest Farver's pocketbook in the granary of the Solomon Shearer farm in Jackson township, where McInturf shot Farver to death last Tuesday, Sheriff Wm. G. Morr and his deputy, Arden Morr, were unable to find it.

When Farver's clothing was found the pockets had been turned wrong side out and the pocketbook, watch and other articles were missing. McInturf declared at the time, however, that he did not know what become of them and repeated over and over that he did not rob the body of his victim.

The admission of McInturf that he did steal the pocketbook and watch came about Sunday when five of his six children made a visit to him at the county jail. In the party was a daughter, Mrs. Ralph Peters of Auburn, and her husband. As Peters was leaving McInturf kissed him and whispered to him. Sheriff Morr followed Peters out and demanded to know what his father-in-law said to him. Peters led the sheriff back to the cell and told McInturf to repeat the statement. McInturf then said he had told Peters where Farver's watch and pocketbook could be found, the pocektbook between joists in the granary, according to McInturf, and the watch in the loft of the barn near the ceiling.

Watch is Recovered

The sheriff and his deputy went to the McInturf place and looked for the pocketbook, but could not find it. They did find the watch, however. They returned Monday morning and failed to locate the purse, but they found a bunch of keys and a tire gauge. The officers do not believe McInturf told them the truth about the hiding place of the purse. How much money was in the pocketbook is not known, but it was probably not a large amount. It was at first reported that it contained a $25 check given to Farver by Walter Baker, but it was learned that this check had been cashed. In his first story in which he claimed the murder was committed by Al McKee of Fort Wayne, McInturf said McKee told him he robbed Farver of $16. Whether this is the sum secured by McInturf from the body is unknown. He had $13 when arrested and he claimed this was his own money.

McInturf did not unfasten the watch chain from his victim's vest, but jerked it in two. Part of the chain was found on the watch in its hiding place and the balance was attached to the vest.

In talking with his children McInturf told them he had to kill Farver to save his own life. He insisted that Farver chased him for 80 at first told the officers that he finat first tod the officers that he finally turned on Farver, whipping out his revolver; that Farver then turned and started to run and that the first shot struck Farver in the back. Then when Farver fell, McInturf said he went up to him and shot him twice in the head. He changed his story Sunday to say that Farver was facing him when he shot him first and that the first bullet hit Farver's head. He declared he and Farver were struggling and he thought Farver was going to choke him to death, so he shot hiim. The sheriff has no confidence in anything McInturf says. In his opinion, McInturf attacked Farver without warning and with murderous intent and that Farver had no chance to protect himself.

The prisoner told the sheriff Sunday that he would like to have some poison so he could end his life.

Many people, some of them coming from long distances in automobiles, visited the scene of the murder Sunday.

Homer McInturf, a Baltimore and Ohio fireman, living in Garrett, made a visit to his brothers and sisters Saturday, but he did not go to the jail to see his father.

LIFE HISTORY OF MARTIN TUSTISON

Martin Tustison, son of Washington and Catherine Cox Tustison, was born in Crawford County, Ohio, November 24, 1845. He departed this life at his home in St. Joe, Indiana, October 25, 1926, aged 80 years, 11 months and 1 day.

When four years of age, he came with his parents to Allen county, Indiana, where they resided for six years. The family then moved to DeKalb county, where the deceased has spent the rmainder of his long christian life.

In 1868 he was united in marriage to Nancy Ellen Lawhead, daughter of Samuel and Martha Lawhead. To this union were born three children, Norma Leona Tustison-Woodcox, Samuel Washington Tustison and Martha Tustison-Bishop, all of whom preceded him to the Great Beyond to join their mother who passed to her reward in 1890.

Martin pursued the occupation of farming for fifteen years on the farm now owned by Henry Shroyer, two miles north of St. Joe. He, with his wife and childrn then moved to St. Joe where he engaged in the grocery business in the building now occupied by the St. Joe News, buying out Eck Fales. After seventen, as a merchant, he retired from active business.

After his wife's death, he continued to maintain a home and care for her parents until they passed away. From that time on he passed his life in the homes of his children until they were all called away. He then purchased a home on Widney Avenue where he lived until the end, save for the past three winters which he spent for the most part with his grandson, Gray Woodcox, and wife, at Garrett.

In 1867 he united with the Methodiist church at Concord. After he moved to St. Joe, he, with his wife and her parents, all united with the Evangelical Lutheran church, to which he has always remained a loyal and faithful member, doing what he conscientiously thought to be right in the sight of God and man.

He was a loving father and a kind, helpful neighbor, always willing to deny self to help others.

He leaves to mourn his departure two grandchildren Margaret Ellen Tustison of Springfield, Ohio, Willis Gray Woodcox of Garrett, Ind., two brothers, Charles A. Tustison of Defiance, Ohio and Nelson Tustison, St. Joe, Ind., one sister, Florence Simanton, St. Joe, Ind., a daughter-in-law, Mrs. Bessie G. Tustison, Springfield, Ohio, a son-in-law, C. A. Woodcox, St. Joe, Ind., and a host of other relatives, friends and neighbors. Their loss is Heaven's gain, as God gathers his choicest flowers unto Himself.

The funeral was held in the Lutheran church where he served so faithfully in many capacitis for so maany years. Rev. A. K. Mumma, officiating. E. R. Kinsey, undertaker. Burial, Riverside cemetery, St. Joe.

SCHOOL CELEBRATION NETTED NICE SUM

Last Friday evening, Hallowe'en) at the public school building, a large and happy crowd were assembled to do honor to the saint who presides over the elfs, goblins, sprites, pixies and what not, who are supposeed to disport themselves on this particular night.

The occasion of this meeting; aside from merriment anticipated; especially from the younger generation, was for the purpose of assisting in raising a fund, to be appropriated toward school "gym" equipment. The new school building, which Concord township is building, is being financed by this township, and by moneys raised by energetic, wide awake public spirited citizens of the same who were enough interested in the cause of education to pledge their aid and financial assistance. This is one of the many more gatherings, which will be held for this laudable purpose.

In point of good fellowship, merriment, and from a financial standpoint Friday's merry making night, was a howling success. Those who sponsored it are to be congratulated for the spirit shown, and the hard work which terminated in such good results.

Many went masked, those attending unmasked were penalized to the extent of ten cents. Ice cream, cake, cider and other refreshments were served, fortunes were told, and in short, the festival resembled in some of its aspects, a county fair.

Two plays were given by high school pupils, which shows that St. Joe is not lacking in histrionic talent.

Costumes were both pretty and unique, considerable time and attention must have been employed in their selection. Three prizes were awarded; one for the best in each class of masked persons; viz: handsomest, homliest, and most unique.

The total receipts from all sources, (stands, etc.,) were approximately $100.00. The total benefit of all cannot be measured in dollars and cents: for the spirit which aided, and the pecuniary benefit, which was a result, when applied to a good cause, that of training minds of this and future generations, transcends all things of a merely transitory and monetary nature.

The people of Concord township are to be commended for their interest in the school's welfare, which was reflected in the substantial, as well as spiritual aid their presence afforded. Let us keep this in mind, and give our best when another effort looking toward one of the country's best institutions, the public school, is brought to our notice.

MAKING PLANS FOR ANNUAL ROLL CALL

The time for the 1926 Red Cross Roll Call is here, commencing Armistice Day, November 11th. It should not be necessary to explain why they should support the Red Cross—the greatest organization of its kind in the world. We all know of the many humanitarian undertakings which it stands ready to perform at all times and immediately upon notice whenever and wherever the need ariaes.

How is the DeKalb County Chapter of the American Red Cross going to put this membership drive over this year? Why should one or two persons in each community of the county take upon themseelves the burden of making a canvass of citizens? It can be done easier and we believe successfully.

First, there will be some place or places designated in each community where vounteers can appear and secure their membership.

Second, every fraternal, civic and church organization is being asked to be responsible for presenting the proposition to their members and securing their Red Cross membership. They are also going to be asked to secure such members outside of their organization as their enthusiasm for the cause will justify.

The committee believes this a better plan than to put the burden upon a special organization all over the county, which it would have to attempt to organize for this special purpose. All these bodies are organized and functioning, and all are pledged to the fraternal, charitable, and humanitarian principals so efficiently carried out by the American Red Cross.

Reports of these various organizations will be made to Chairmen appointed in the varions communities, or to the office of the DeKalb County Chapter at Auburn. At the conclusion of the first week of the campaign the lists of the organizations will be published showing the extent of their cooperation as evidenced by memberships secured.

Parent-Teacher Association

GETTING ACQUAINTED

As the new school year is now well started around St. Joe we feel it is a good time to suggest to the parents of children now in our school that they make it a point to get better acquainted with those into whose care they have entrusted their children. Some families make it a point to invite the teacher into their homes occasionally, to a meal or a pleasant social evening; others ask them for an auto ride from time to time. As a result the teacher feels that he or she is in much closer harmony with the entire community, that the work is being appreciated, and they strive to do still better work.

Parents who drop in at the school where their child is attending are always welcome. Such little visits encourage the children and also indicate to the teacher that the visitor is anxious to cooperate in every way possible to advance the educational system of the community. It is quite a business to raise a family of children, or even a single child. If parents and teachers work along purely independent lines and never consult together, they are apt not to work for the same ends. A little more cooperation would help very much. Some of the teachers who are away from home feel rather lonely at times and wish for more friends and a little social attention. In view of the fact that in their hands rests a large part of the child's welfare it would seem to be only an obligation fulfilled to see that this is provided them.

TWO SENTENCED TO STATE REFORMATORY

Frank Loftus, Auburn Crippled Lad, and Frederick Burns to Serve Time

Two sentences for petit larceny were imposed in the DeKalb circuit court Saturday, Frank Loftus of Auburn, and Frederick Burns of Fort Wayne, both being sent to the Indiana reformatory for terms of one to eight years.

Loftus had pleaded guilty to stealing a large number of old coins from the home of Elmer O. Likens in Auburn. Only a part of the coins were recovered. Loftus claimed he sold some of them to a stranger he met who said he lived near Sturgis, Mich., and who did not give his name. One coin sold to "Hank" Barnes of Auburn, and resold to "Billy" Weaver of Auburn, was recovered. An effort is being made by the sheriff to recover the coins still missing.

Loftus is only sixteen years old and is a cripple. Judge Endicott hoped to suspend the sentence, but he found the boy was untruthful to him and no one offered to take him in charge if he were allowed to go on probation.

Burns walked into the apartment of Guy Roser above the Transfer Lunch in Garrett and stole a $5 bill and a watch and chain. He admitted having been in trouble before for stealing and he was once arrested on a charge of murder, but said he proved his innocence and was released.

CONCERNING RELIGION

Two London publications have recently published the results of a questionnaire submitted to readers about religion. The weekly finds 537 persons believing in a personal God and 736 rejecting the idea. Christianity, in some form, is accepted by 666 readers as against 595 who do not so believe. The divinity of Christ fails to get a popular majority, only 474 out of 1300 admitting the belief.

The London daily, probably closer in touch with British life, has a more encouraging result from its inquiry into the religious belief of nearly 15,000 people. Seventy-one per cent accepted a personal God, seventy-two per cent a personal immortality, and seventy-five per cent some form of Christianity. The Apostles Creed is accepted by a majority of over 2,000, 71 per cent voluntarily attend services and 63 per cent regard the Bible as inspired

CLOSING SCENES OF WORLD WAR ARE RECALLED

Where Fighting of Famous American Divisions Was Most Effective.

"Writing in the Philadelphia Ledger, Corliss Hooven Griffis gave the following graphic description of war-torn France and Belgium at the close of the contest:

"The village of Le Catelet, which is mostly destroyed, was the scene of the most intense fighting when it was reached by the Twenty-seventh division. To the south through Vaux-Andigny is the battleground of the Thirtieth. In this sector we saw the tunnel made by the St. Quentin canal, as it runs for more than three miles below the surface of the ground. This tunnel, built by Napoleon, is a very unusual thing. It was employed extensively by the Germans as a safe rest billet, and they fitted up the tunnel with commodious quarters, offices, kitchens and even stables. When the Americans captured this part of the canal they took many prisoners here, as the enemy poured out of the entrance to their underground quarters like rabbits out of a warren.

"One route led on through Cambrai and Lille into Belgium. After crossing the Belgian frontier we came upon the sectors that were fought over by the Thirty-seventh and Ninety-first divisions. Here, as a part of the Sixth French army, they assisted in driving the Germans across the Scheldt river.

"Belgium is not France, and there is a world of difference in many ways. In the first place, the houses are all of red brick instead of stone. And this gives every village a decidedly dusty appearance. The trees along the roads are different, and windmills dot the landscape with waving arms. The country, though flat, is decidedly beautiful because of the care it receives. So crowded, moreover, are conditions in Belgium, with houses and villages everywhere, that the whole country reminds one of passing through the suburbs of some large city.

Belgian Reconstruction.

"Of course, Belgium also has tremendous and pitiful areas where the war has effaced everything; but, as German reparations payments have been made to Belgium first, the reconstruction work here is further along than it is in France. Yet there still remains a vast amount to be done. For example, we passed through a great deal of devastation between Ghent and Menin. From Menin on our way to Ypres and crossing the border until we arrived at Lille in France on the journey back, we did not see one tree left standing or one house that had survived the war. For miles and miles, hour upon hour, we rode through a scene of such desolation as it is impossible to comprehend.

"There is no doubt that the two outstanding cities of the war were Verdun and Ypres. So much is associated with these two places that their chronicles almost embody the story of the war. In them, the hopes and fears and miseries of two nations were bound up. Yet after seeing both, Verdun impresses us as terrible, but glorious; Ypres as pre-eminently tragic.

"We had heard so much of Ypres, reading of the struggle there every day for years, that it seemed as if we ought to know the city when we saw it. On the way, we rode down the famous Menin road. Never in all history has any road been so bathed in blood as this—fought over incessantly as it was for four long years. Following it takes one through the heart of the most terrible of the British fighting zones, and panoramas of battlefields unfold before the eye as mile after mile is traversed.

"We passed through one area where we counted fourteen tanks in the surrounding fields, lying just where they had been put out of action, grim relics of a furious battle. Not even the stumps of trees are left here—the devastation is utter, complete.

Tragedy at Hooge.

"Close upon Ypres we passed through a little cluster of wooden shacks—the name of the place was Hooge. It gave me a shiver to see it, for Hooge was one of the deadliest spots of the entire war. It was here that the Hun first used the diabolical invention of liquid fire on July 30, 1915, and the British were literally burned alive. It was also at Hooge during the German attack that the Canadians lost more than 7,000 men, a startling percentage of their fighting force, on June 2, 1916.

"In this vicinity, where little attempt has been made to cultivate the ground again, there is not one foot of the soil which has not been blown up at some time. Along the roadside we passed many British cemeteries, and these gave the final note of tragedy to it all.

"Ypres is so thoroughly ruined that there is very little left to see. The remnants of the once magnificent Cloth hall and cathedral dominate what is left of the town, and are impressive even in their shattered condition. Rebuilding is now going forward in Ypres so rapidly that before long much of the devastation will have been removed; but it will take many long years to efface the devastation in the hearts of countless thousands wrought by the Germans at Ypres. It is impossible to escape a feeling of horror upon entering the city today; and yet there is inspiration, too, for Ypres means nothing if not courage and devotion to duty—and sacrifice."

Brings the knowledge of forty years of experience in the successful treatment of Complicated chronic conditions.

Expert Service Free of Charge:—

Dr. Culver experienced Specialist, formerly with National Doctors of Milwaukee, also some years connected with the Chicago Hospital, treats without SURGICAL OPERATIONS or HYPODERMIC INJECTIONS diseases of the Blood, Skin and the Internal Organs, Rheumatism, Sciata, Lung Troubles, Old Ulcers, Tape worm, Eczema, Asthma, Chronic Chronic Constipation, Epilepsy, High Blood Pressure, Bed-wetting and other morbid affections of the body.

Years of erperience and the great number of cases successfully treated prove that the methods of the Doctor are very dependable.

Many people keep on suffering from ailments that might be greatly improved because they cannot afford to go to high-priced Specialists away from home, and few communities have sufficient numbers of such cases to support a Specialist.

The Doctor has solved this problem by traveling from town to town to meet the sick. He instructs patients, recommends a course of treatment, and teaches failing men and women how to take care of themselves at home.

To those having ailments of long standing, whatever the trouble may be, and notwithstanding the poor results of former treatments come and talk it over.

Examination and advice FREE.

IDEAL KITCHEN FLOOR IS COMFORTABLE

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The ideal kitchen floor is durable, comfortable to walk and stand on, smooth, but not slippery, easy to clean, not injured by grease and water, and attractive in color and appearance. The wooden floor finished with oil or paint or covered with a good quality of plain or inlaid linoleum meets many of these requirements. The illustration shows the kitchen of Mrs. Jabuke of Chesterfield county, Virginia. The work table is covered with linoleum, varnished to withstand water, heat and grease; the garbage pail with perforated lid at left of bins; top of cabinet removed and fastened on wall, making a convenient cupboard, and the floor is covered with linoleum, varnished to withstand water, heat and grease.

MAKE BUDGET OF LIVING EXPENSES

Good Reasons for Planning Use of Income in Advance.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Various reasons are given for not budgeting household expenditures. By a budget is meant planning the use of the income in advance, after analyzing past expenditures, so as to get more for one's money this year, if possible, than before. One home maker says, perhaps, that she is poor at figures; another that she handles only part of the family money; a third that the income is variable, so she cannot tell what there will be to spend. Still others believe that they are already practicing every possible economy and that planning for forthcoming expenditures would do them no good. "I never spend a cent I don't have to!" cries this type of woman, while another may confess, "I don't want to know where the money has gone!"

But almost every home maker on a moderate income has common sense enough to admit that by planning ahead for certain major expenses—a graduation dress for the daughter, say, or music lessons, or even bigger things like owning a home or a car—these advantages have been achieved although it looked fairly hopeless at the start. So it is only a short step from that admission to the next, which is that by applying similar planning to the whole range of household expenditures, haphazard living could be converted into steady forward progress for the entire family. Every business, even the United States government, is run on a basis of a fixed sum allowed for future expenditures, each class planned in detail. The family budget is different only in the amount of money involved, but the same in principle.

Many home makers do not realize that part of their work is the management of a business, that one of their important tasks is the handling of part or all of the family income, and that the success of their many other activities depends largely upon their success in doing this well. The home maker who says she does not wish to know how her money was spent is ignoring this aspect of her job.

The United States Department of Agriculture has recently issued a circular intended to help you with the details of budget planning. No authority can supply a budget ready-made, for a good spending plan in one case might be a very poor one for another family of the same size and income, each living in the same town.

Miscellaneous Circular 68, "Planning Your Family Expenditures," is free while the supply lasts. It contains many suggestions as to how to group the usual household expenditures. Special attention is given to the matter of farm household records, since some of the products of the farm are used in the household. At the end are a number of questions which suggest where to look for leaks and how to approach the solution of some of your individual problems.

HARD TO SELECT WASHING MACHINE

Many Little Points to Consider Before Purchase.

Before purchasing a washing machine it is desirable to know something of the various types and the principles on which each is operated, says the United States Department of Agriculture. Although there are over 100 makes of washing machines, the various designs can be classified into five types, most of which can be operated by hand, water power, gasoline engine, or electricity. The main principle in all is the forcing of soapy water through the clothes by agitating the clothes and the water and thus displacing the dirt.

The cylinder washers usually have a perforated cylinder of metal or wood for the clothes. This revolves in an outer container for the soap and water, reversing its direction at regular intervals. The dolly or agitator type, especially common in hand-power machines, has a revolving device attached to the lid or the bottom for moving the clothes about in the water. The oscillating types have a metal or wooden tub which rocks back and forth, tossing the clothes through the water. The vacuum-cup type is a development of the funnel-on-a-stick washing device, and may have from one to four cups which move up and down, forcing water through the clothes. The washboard type is seen only in hand-power machines now.

Unless there is a pressure of 15 to 20 pounds to the square inch at the faucet and a flow of 4 to 6 gallons per minute, a water-power machine will not be satisfactory. If an electric machine is being purchased, the current specifications of the local source of power must be known and given in the order.

Consider all the following points: Whether the gearing is enclosed or open; whether the motor is water-tight or placed where there is little chance of its getting wet; how easily the machine can be moved about and yet held in place while the motor is running; the shape and size of the machine in relation to the room where it must be used and stored; how often the machinery must be oiled and whether that can be done easily; strength and rigidity of the frame; and the service for repairs and new parts.

Well-Balanced Diet Is Needed for Maintenance

The well-balanced diet provides within the limits of the fuel, or calories, needed to maintain the best body weight for age and height: Protein, right in kind and amount; iron; calcium; phosphorus; and vitamins A, B and C. The diet should be either bulky or "potentially" bulky.

Balance should be extended also to matters that affect taste, adds the United States Department of Agriculture. There must be a variety of flavors. Bland, sweet, sour, and savory foods must be used in right proportions, and either carefully blended or skillfully contrasted. So, too with textures. Hardness, softness, starchiness, fattiness, crispness, and succulence, are all pleasing qualities, but they must be balanced one with another if the diet as a whole is to be attractive.

Clean Wax Floors

To clean wax floors, remove the film of dirt and wax, which darkens the floor, with a cloth wrung out of warm soapy water, or better still a cloth moistened with turpentine or gasoline. Remember though that turpentine and gasoline are very inflammable and do not use them in a room with an open fire or a lighted lamp or candle. After the dirty coating has been removed, but be sure it is all removed and that the floor is clean and dry, apply a little more wax, and rub it in well with a woolen cloth or a weighted brush. Be careful, however, not to apply too much wax.

POULTRY

LAYERS SHOULD NOT BE TOO FAT

The skillful feeder tries to get his laying hens to consume the greatest amount of feed possible. That is, the greatest amount of feed which chickens will use in the production of eggs is the most profitable. Therefore, any stated amounts cannot be followed in all cases. You should feed what your hens will clean up without getting fat. As corn is a better heat-producing feed than the other grains, more corn should be fed during cold weather than on warm winter days.

Dry mashes should be kept before the fowls at all times, so that they can have access to them whenever hungry. This saves time and labor. Chickens do not have to grind the mash in their gizzards, so it can be eaten at any time the chicken feels inclined to do so.

It is estimated that hens which are kept confined eat from 70 to 100 pounds of grain and mash in a year. Light breeds such as Leghorns and like breeds will eat the smaller amount. This means that each hen will eat 3 to 4 ounces a day. A quart of dry mash mentioned above will weigh approximately one pound. A quart of scratch feed will weigh approximately 1½ pounds. Therefore, one quart of such a dry mash and one quart of such a scratch feed, would be enough to feed 10 hens of the larger breeds one day. Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes, Rhode Island Reds and Orpingtons are considered the larger general purpose breeds. If you have a more or less number of hens you can figure from these amounts how much you should feed each day.

Late Molting Hens Are Best for Breeding Pen

During the molt hens lose all indications of production, including capacity, large, moist vent, good laying condition as indicated by some surplus fat in the abdomen, and bright head parts. Therefore, do not try and use these indications during the molt.

Early molters are usually the poor producers; late molters are usually the best producers.

One way to pick out the best hens for laying to use in the breeding pen would be to mark the late molters and breed only from them next spring.

Improvement cannot be made without selection. Now is the time to begin increasing your next year's egg supply by picking out the hens that have laid the latest in the season. These will usually be the late molters. Mark them and put them in a breeding flock next spring and breed only from them.—Extension Service, Colorado Agricultural College.

Shed-Roof House

Ten feet is about the right depth for a shed-roof house, with the front wall six feet high and the rear one four feet. Face the front wall south or southeast to get the direct sunlight, and leave it open part way down. Then have shutters covered with burlap, or curtains, to cover this opening in stormy or cold weather. In sections having severe winters, there should also be curtains to drop around the roosts on cold nights.

Poultry Facts

Young ganders make better breeders than do young geese.

Lice will kill not only poults but also mature turkeys. Watch for them.

Poultry farming cannot be called poultry farming unless every branch of the work is touched.

Dampness is a foe to turkeys of all ages. Keep them in when it rains, and when the grass is wet with dew.

Already the poultry breeder is dreaming of the chicks which he will hatch next March and April and the wise breeder will give some thought to the hens and pullets from which he will breed next spring.

* * *

Green feeds are of great value to fowls and should be supplied to the flock through the winter months.

Arrange your market, if you have not already done so. Poultrymen who accept any old market they can get seldom make the highest profits that they are entitled to.

Most of the vegetables that can be stored through the winter make satisfactory green feed for poultry. They include cabbage, beets, carrots, potatoes and mangels.

It is hard to find more profitable birds to keep on the farm than a flock of turkeys.

Poultrymen advise keeping the selected young roosters by themselves in preparation for the breeding season.

Much equipment is not essential to raise turkeys successfully, but considerable work is required in their care, especially while they are very young, care and cleanliness being two important factors.

Salts Fine for Aching Kidneys

When Back Hurts Flush Your Kidneys as You Clean Your Bowels

Most folks forget that the kidneys, like the bowels, sometimes get sluggish and clogged and need a flushing occasionally, else we have backache and dull misery in the kidney region, severe headaches, rheumatic twinges, torpid liver, acid stomach, sleeplessness and all sorts of bladder disorders.

You simply must keep your kidneys active and clean and the moment you feel an ache or pain in the kidney region begin drinking lots of water. Also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good drug store here, take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys will then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and is intended to flush clogged kidneys and help stimulate them to activity. It also helps neutralize the acids in the urine so they no longer irritate, thus helping to relieve bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; makes a delightful effervescent lithia water drink which everybody should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean.

A well-known local druggist says he sells lots of Jad Salts to folks who believe in trying to correct kidney trouble while it is only trouble.

could find no trace of him. However, they did find a place on the ground in the sugar camp sixty rods south of the house where a man had evidently fallen over, bled and died. The sheriff believes the body then was carried for a short distance and then was dragged a distance of about forty rods through a pasture. Some rails were taken from fence and the body evidently was pulled over the fence. There the trail of blood ends. On the opposite side of the fence in a corn field are wagon tracks that lead to McInturf's barn yard.

The sheriff went to McInturf's house about 5 o'clock Wednesday afternoon. He had just come in from a field. He was asked if he had seen Farver. He admitted having talked with him Monday. He said he went to the Farver place Tuesday morning and was there for some time and returned in the afternoon, and was expecting Farver, but that he did not show up. He declared he did not see him that day. The sheriff took McInturf over the bloody trail, but he insisted he knew nothing about it. He was placed in the county jail and was questioned by the sheriff and the prosecuting attorney, Capt. H. C. Springer, but without results. He was held in jail pending developments.

Mrs. Jesse Watson reported to the sheriff that she saw Farver pass her house about 10 o'clock Tuesday morning, evidently on his way to his farm.

Late Thursday afternoon searching parties were still trying to find Farver. Blood hounds from Bryan, Ohio, were sent for and were taken to the farm and surrounding territory.

FRIDAY'S EVENTS

Day's progress given in detail as given by Auburn Evening Star, in the greatest murder case in DeKalb County.

Charley McInturf, a Jackson township farmer, confessed Friday morning at 7:30 o'clock in the DeKalb county jail that he murdered his neighbor, Forrest Farver, in a fight following a controversy over McInturf's attentions to Mrs. Lelia Farver, Farver's wife.

From statements made by both McInturf and Mrs. Farver, they had discussed making some disposition of Farver, who stood in their way, but it is unlikely that she had anything to do with the planning of the murder as it was committed. She was taken into custody Thursday morning by Sheriff Wm. G. Morr and was questioned throughout the afternoon at the sheriff's residence. She finally signed a statement telling of her illicit relations with McInturf, and with their discussions of a method to get him out of the way by poisoning him. She was released from custody about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, being returned to her home at Waterloo by Deputy Sheriff Arden Morr.

McInturf told the officers early Friday morning that the murder was committed by Al McKee of Fort Wayne, cousin of his, and that he saw McKee drop the body into an abandoned well on the Curtis Watt farm in Spencer township, a mile and a half east of the McInturf home. Sheriff Morr and his deputy, Coroner Amos N. Adams, Charles Davis, chief of police of Auburn, Undertakers Ray and Jay Dilgard and Mr. Watt, went to the well about 2:30 Friday morning and found the body. It had been thrown into the well head first. The well is about twenty-five feet deep and thirty inches in diameter. There was only a little water in it. The body was recovered after some effort by getting a rope around one of the legs.

When McInturf was first taken into custody late Wednesday he denied any knowledge of the disappearance of Farver. He had talked with Farver at the farm the day before and knew Farver was going to return Tuesday. He said he went to the Farver place Tuesday morning and again in the afternoon, but that Farver did not show up. McInturf then denied he knew anything about the trail of blood that indicated Farver had been murdered and the body disposed of.

Search for Farver

Officers kept on talking to McInturf at the jail while a search was being made for Farver's body. A large number of neighbors joined in search Thursday, as well as Farver's father and brothers and sister. The father is John H. Farver, 78, living northeast of Angola. The brothers are Joseph Farver, living east of Angola and Ernest Farver of Auburn, and the sister is Mrs. Homer Bower of Auburn.

Joseph Farver had a bloodhound brought from Bryan, O., Thursday afternoon. The dog was taken to the Farver farm and followed the trail the murderer took with the body. The dog went into the field on the Watt farm towards the well where the body was found, but turned off 300 or 400 feet from the well. Art McNamara, Herman Peters and Fred Miller, who were in the searching party, made a trip to the well about 4 o'clock Thursday afternoon and could see a white object at the bottom. They thought it was a bucket, but it was revealed later that it was Farver's bare back. The well was brick walled and years ago furnished the water supply for a family occupying a house nearby. However, there has been no house there for a long time and the well was not used. There was a rail over the hole. The well is about 120 rods from the road. When the body was found it was clothed in a pair of trousers and a shirt, but the shirt was rolled up to the neck. There were a pair of gloves on the hands. The officers could not tell whether Farver had been shot or struck by a manure hook. It was determined afterward that there was a bullet wound in the back and two in the head.

Persistent questioning finally resulted in McInturf telling that he had knowledge of the murder, but he declared he had nothing to do with it. He said he was at the Farver place Tuesday morning when McKee and another man whom he did not know came in a Ford coupe and said they wanted to see Farver. McInturf said he went home before Farver's arrival and that McKee and his companion remained at Farver's. That night he said McKee came to his home and told him he had killed Farver. He said McKee told him he walked across the fields with Farver, talking to him about buying the farm, and that he shot Farver, then robbed him of $16 or $17. McKee told him, according to McInturf, that he had the body with him. McInturf said he told McKee to get the body away or he (McInturf) would be suspected of the crime. McKee wanted to know what to do with it. So McInturf said he went along and showed McKee the well on the Watt farm. He said he watched McKee drop the body into the well and then leave.

Story Was Improbable

After a time the officers told McInturf that he had made up an improbable story. He was told that McKee had been arrested at Fort Wayne by the police and had established an alibi. McInturf challenged the officers to bring McKee before him and he stuck to the story. After the body of Farver was removed to the Dilgard morgue McInturf was taken there by the officers. He was ordered to turn the body over and show the bullet wound in the back. McInturf complied, but it was apparent he was under a great strain. Said Charles Davis to him, "Farver has gone to answer to the same God that you will have to." "Yes", said McInturf, "God knows who done it."

The suspected man then was returned to the jail and it was decided that the officers should talk to him in two-hour relays. Mr. Davis was alone with him for an hour or more when he confessed. He took Mr. Davis's advice that it would be better to make a clean breast of the crime and ask the court for mercy than to be found guilty, in which event he would doubtless go to the gallows.

How He Got Gun

The officers believe that McInturf has told a straight story concerning his fatal fight with Farver. He explained the possession of the gun with which he killed Farver in this way: He said that while Mrs. Farver was in Ohio some time ago visiting her mother he was sleeping at his home one night with his son. It was after midnight, he said, when he was awakened by the dogs barking. He said he looked out the window and saw Farver standing there with a gun pointed at him. He got out of bed and then he said Farver left. McInturf declares his dogs saved his life by awakening him. He believes, he said that Farver thought Mrs. Farver was there with him and that he intended to kill them both.

A short time later McInturf said he went to East Garrett to visit Bert McDaniel, whom he has known for years. McDaniel's eighteen year old son was showing him a .22 calibre revolver and McInturf said he borrowed it from him in order to protect himself from Farver.

The sheriff looked for the gun in the hay mow where McInturf said he hid it after the murder, but could not find it. McInturf expressed a wish to go home and see his children and he said he would then show the officers where the gun was. The officers agreed to make the trip with him Friday afternoon.

McInturf showed considerable feeling when something was said about his children. His oldest son, Homer, is a Baltimore and Ohio fireman living in Garrett. The oldest daughter, Irene, is married to Ralph Peters of Auburn. There are four children at home. They are Marie, 16, Juanita, 14, Marjorie, 12, and Bobbie, 6. There mother, who was Bertha Wyatt before her marriage, died from tuberculosis two or three years ago. It is said that McInturf was brutal to her in her affliction and refused to buy milk for her.

McInturf was born in Licking county, Ohio, and his mother, Mrs. Belle McInturf, lives there, as well as eight brothers and sisters. McInturf has been in Indiana for a score of years. He and his family at different times lived near Avilla, on the Albert Witt farm in Butler township, on the Henry Myers farm on the Butler-Jackson township line, and they have been on the Solomon Shearer place in Jackson township for the last six years. McInturf is very ignorant. He can sign his name, but he cannot write more than that and he cannot read.

Improper Relations

In her statement to the officers, Mrs. Farver admits having been intimate with McInturf and that he was a frequent caller at her home for several years. She said she did not know whether he is the father of her youngest child. She said McInturf wanted her to get poison and put it in her husband's bologna, but that she told him she couldn't do that. She said McInturf told her that her husband would "get" her and McInturf and that they had better get Farver first. This was about last Labor Day. Mrs. Farver admitted misconduct with other men in the neighborhood.

Autopsy is Held

At the direction of Coroner Adams, Dr. A. V. Hines of Auburn, and Dr. Gasperson of Butler, conducted an autopsy over Farver's body Friday. They found that death was due to a hemorrhage from a bullet wound in the back and from shock.

One bullet entered about the center of the back and pierced the lung. Another entered the head above the nose and followed the contour of the skull, emerging without entering the skull. The other bullet entered the head above the left eye and was imbedded next to the skull bone. The head wounds would not have caused death. It is considered likely that Farver lived an hour or more after he was shot.

Taken To His Home

Charley McInturf of Jackson township, confessed slayer of Forrest Farver, a neighbor, made a visit to the scene of the crime Friday afternoon in the company of Sheriff Wm. G. Morr, Deputy Sheriff Arden Morr, Howard S. Grimm, deputy prosecuting attorney, Charles Davis, chief of police of Auburn, Coroner N. Adams and others.

The primary purpose of the trip was to recover the .22 calibre revolver that McInturf used in murdering Farver. McInturf stated in his confession given to the officers Friday morning that he hid the weapon in the haymow of his barn, but the sheriff and coroner were unable to find it. McInturf offered to get the gun if he were taken to the barn. He was anxious to see his childern.

Arriving at the McInturf home, McInturf was taken at once to the barn and he pointed out where he had placed revolver Tuesday night after the killing. The mow had a large quantity of hay in it and the gun was secreted in the hay behind a support to the mow. It was loaded full of Shells. McInturf said he had used three bullets on Farver and then had reloaded the revolver.

Going to the water tank in the barn yard, McInturf pulled out of the straw surrounding the tank, Farver's coat and vest. The pock-

CONFESSION OF CHARLES McINTURF

My name is Charles McInturf and I am 44 years of age and live in Jackson Township, DeKalb County, Indiana. I knew Forrest Farver and he had lived, up to a week ago on a farm one-half mile north of me. On Tuesday, October 26, 1926, I was digging potatoes on Farver's farm and finished about 11 o'clock when Farver came to the patch where I had been working and started an argument with me in reference to the relations between myself and his wife. Farver called me names and threw sticks and clubs at me and I crossed the road into my woods and he followed me and he kept following me and picking up chunks of wood. We reached the fence by my corn field and he struck me with a chunk of wood and I pulled my revolver from my pocket and told him that he had run me far enough and that I would not stand for it. When he saw the gun he started to run and I shot him in the back and when he fell I think I shot him two more times in the head. I then picked him up and carried him into the woods to the west on the Farver farm. Then I went home to dinner.

I went back to the body at about 6:30 in the evening and got Farver's body and carried him to my house and put it in the automobie that was setting in the shed and went to the house and got the oil can and drove east toward Concord. I drove about two miles east and parked the car along the road and took the boy out of the car and carried it across the fields to the well on the Watt farm and placed it in the well. I carried the body part of the way and dragged it part of the way. I then went back to the car and went to Concord and stayed about one hour and returned home and went to bed. The revolver is hidden in the hay in the west hay mow of my barn and is a .22 calibre revolver.

Mrs. Farver had told me not to take anything off of Farver and if he jumped on to me to get him. Mrs. Farver and I had been intimate and she wanted me to run away with her and said she would poison Farver only that she was afraid to do it.

I borrowed the revolver from the McDanie boy about one month before.

At the time the argument started I asked Farver what he was doing near my house with a gun some time before and he said I would have soon showed you what I would have done if you had waited a little longer and I told him two could play at that game and I could shoot too and then he called me a name and I started toward my woods, and what I have related above is a true statement of what happened.

I make this statement of my own free will and accord and without any coercion, threats, promises or any other pressure and with a full understanding of my legal rights to refuse to take or make a statement and what I have said and related has been voluntarily and of my own free will and accord.

By Trying to Do Without Glasses.....

When you should wear them you harm your eyes. But that isn't all of it nor the worst of it. Strained eyes have a habit of upsetting things generally. There are many conditions outside of the eyes that eye strain causes. And proper glasses remove thm all, almost at once in many cases. We find and eliminate the cause of eye strain.

Chas. Bleeks is doing some remodeling at his farm home. He has moved his two houses together, dug a basement under the entire house, installing a furnace and making a modern country home.

We are forcibly reminded that "the melancholy days are come" by the amount of golden leaves piled indiscriminately about. If "father's pride and mother's joy" will direct half the energy he displays in a game of "shinny" to raking up the aforesaid leaves and burning or otherwise destroying them it will take about twenty-four hours to make the lawns about town present a marked difference in their apparance.

When the people can be made to understand that it actually costs more in time and money to travel over a poor road than it does to travel over a good one, they will be less inclined to begrudge the expense of good roads, and what is more important still, will be willing and anxious to put the business of road making into the hands of intelligent men who understand the business. Poor roads are the expensive things that curse a country district.

Would it not be well for parents who have children attending school in the town to take interest enough in the schools and their children to visit the schools at least one time during the term. We hear parents complaining of the schools, who have no more knowledge of how they are being conducted than a resident of China has. What should the people of a town feel prouder of than good schools? What will bring a good class of people to any town more rapidly than good schools? Parents go to your schools and see for yourselves, and don't accept idle reports about your schools and the teachers as facts.

JUDGE JAMES A. COX OF THE 40th JUDICIAL DISTRICT, COMMENDS HOGG

Fort Wayne, Ind., Oct. 26th.—Judge James A. Cox of the 40th Judicial Circuit of Indiana today said:—

"It as my pleasure to visit the first session of the 69th Congress of which David Hogg was a member. Two years ago I asked the people of the Twetlfh District to consider his candidacy, knowing the struggles of his early boyhood days. As I saw him a member of the United States Congress I realized the serious attention that he was giving to his duty and the respect in which he was held by his colleagues. I recalled then, when a lad from six to twelve years of age, he constantly led his blind father about the community; how he worked in factories from the time he was twelve years of age until he was fifteen; how he worked night and day to go through college and even took his mother to Bloomington with him in order for her to avoid the hardships of farm life, and finally how he took his mother with him to Washington, when elected as a member of Congress.

No one has a record more commendable. I know the people of the Twelfth District want a man of that kind in Congress."

ANOTHER AUBURN VETERAN IS DEAD

James W. May, another of the few remaining Civil War veterans affiliated with DeLong Post, No. 67 of Auburn, died Sunday evening at 7 o'clock at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Fidellis C. Feller at Fort Wayne.

Mr. May had been making his home with his daughter for the past year and a half since leaving Auburn. Death was caused by pneumonia following an illness of ten days.

His body was brought to Auburn on Monday and was taken to the home of his grandson, Austin B. Feller, until the funeral.

Mr. May lived in Auburn about twenty years, going there from Concord township where he resided on a farm for some time after he quit railroading on the Baltimore and Ohio. He came to DeKalb county shortly after the close of the Civil War and was united in marriage to Harriett E. Layman of Concord township, September 24, 1866. His birth occurred August 7, 1845, at Denmark, Morrow county, Ohio.

He served during the Civil War in two enlistments, both in the infantry and cavalry. He enlisted in Company B, Independent Battalion Ohio Cavalry and at th close of a year's service he enlisted in Company I 38th Ohio Infantry. During his service Mr. May was with General U. S. Grant during the entire march from Atlanta to the sea.

Mr. May is survived by four of seven children, Frank May of Auburn, Mrs. Feller at whose home he died, Alva Curtiss May of Canton, Ohio and Mrs. Viola E. Coe of Sacramento, Cal., by nine grandchildren, and asister, Mrs. Harriett Hobson of Fort Wayne.

In Tuesday night at 8 o'clock the Fort Wayne Sons of Veterans of the Civil War and its auxiliary organization, the Daughters of Veterans of Fort Wayne, held a memorial service at the Feller home in Auburn.

Funeral services were held at the M. P. Church at St. Joe Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Burial in the cemetery at St. Joe.

GEORGIA M. WALTER MAKES STATEMENT

As it is impossible for me to visit all the voters of this community, I desire in this manner to place my name before each and every voter foh their consideration of my ability for the office of County Recorder.

If elected I shall have the same enthusiasm that I have herstofore shown in all public work. If the voters of DeKalb County see fit to trust me with the recording of their important documents, I shall consider that I owe them a debt that I shall endeavor to pay by efficient service and courteous treatment at all times.

Your vote November 2nd, will be appreciated. 43t1.

DIVISIONAL MEETING IN AUBURN ATTENDED BY 120

The first county rally of the educational division of the DeKalb County Council of Religious Education which was held Wednesday night in St. Mark's Luthran church in Auburn, was exceptionally well attended. One hundred and twenty responded at roll call. The meeting started with a banquet at 6:30 in the church basement after which the program for the mess meeting was held in the auditorium. The church was filled.

During the banquet toasts were given by George A. Beugnot, of Auburn, ex-president of the county Sunday School organization and a state vice president, Rev. J. A. Poer, pastor of the Corunna Christian church, Miss Vera Wilkins of Garrett and Mrs. Nora McDonald of Corunna, the divisional superintendent. The subjects discussed were teacher's training, graded instruction, daily vacation bible schools, temperance and missions.

E. T. Albertson, of Indianapolis, state secretary of the organization gave the address in the church auditorium. The program started with an organ voluntary by Naomi Hensel and vocal music was furnished by a male quartette composed of Jeff Buss, Wilbur Miser and Archie Fretz of Richland township and Albert Yoder of Jackson township.

The rally concluded with a playlet by the young people of the St. Joe M. P. Sunday School, which brought out the work of missions.

This playlet will be repeated at Butler Center on the evening of November 7th:

Don't Rub Your Eyes If They Burn

Why do you rub your eyes? You rub them because they itch, burn, feel sticky, or are otherwise uncomfortable. The hands are not always clean which is a good reason why you should not rub them. Discomfort in the eyes or lids is almost invariably due to congestion. That is, there is too much blood there. To rub the eyes is to increase the blood supply. If your hands are cold you rub them to "improve the circulation." That means you rub them to get more blood into your hands. For the same reason rubbing your eyes will cause more blood to rush to tissues which are already overcrowded with blood. The most common cause for congestion is overuse or improper use if the eyes. Reading too long or reading by bad light will produc it. Long use of the eyes at sewing or embroidery will cause congestion. Nature is very kind to us and she will permit almost unlimited use of the eyes, provided they are normal as to sight. The general vigor has everything to do with the eye vigor. It is amazing what a great proportion of persons have defective vision of one form or another. The first thing to be thought of if the eyes itch and burn or give other signs of congestion is to see what is wrong with the vision. It is possible glasses will help. Let us examine your eyes and determine if glasses will help—if they will we make them to fit your eyes and your pocket book. Give us a trial.

VOL. XL ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1926 NUMBER 45

McINTURF IS GIVEN LIFE SENTENCE

"Do you plead guilty or not guilty?" Judge Endicott asked Charles McInturf in the DeKalb circuit court Thursday morning.

"Guilty," answered the prisoner at the bar, and he made no further statement.

The court remanded McInturf to the custody of the sheriff while he took the cause under advisement.

With McInturf was his attorney, Willis Rhoads. It was found upon investigation Wednesday afternoon that McInturf had no money or resources for payment of counsel and the court therefore designated the county attorney for the poor to advise him.

Mr. Rhoads talked with McInturf at the county jail. McInturf told Mr. Rhodes his story of the murder of Forrest Farver, which took place in Jackson township October 26. Mr. Rhoads advised him to make a clean breast of his guilt to the court. He told him that he woud receive a death sentence, or woud be sent to the penitentiary for life, but that he stood a better chance of the latter if he did not fight the case. McInturf expressed himself as now ready to plead guilty, remarking that it didn't make much difference to him what became of him, excepting for the sake of his chidren. He wondered what would become of them, but was assured that they would be given proper attention and care.

Sentence is Pronounced

McInturf was returned to court at 3:15 Thursday afternoon and sentenced to a life term in the state prison at Michigan City.

When Judge Endicott was ready to pass sentence he asked the prosecuting attorney if he wished to make a statement. Capt. Springer stated that no question existed but that his was an inentional and brutal murder, with no mitigating circumstances. "The only question left is what in the court's opinion would be sufficient punishment," said the prosecutor. "I believe that capital punishment should be inflicted in any case of intentional, premeditated murder This is a case of that character, and it is my attitude that the defendant shoud pay for this crime with his life.

"It may be however, that the ends of public justice would be better served by a sentence of life imprisonment and I am willing to leave it to the sound discretion of the court as to the proper protection of the rights of the public and sufficient punishment to the defendant for his crime."

The court then called upon Willis Rhoads, counsel for McInturf. Mr. Rhoads said that it is easy for people to say the defendant should suffer the consequences of his crime. Also, he said, it is easy for all of us to make excuses for what we do. This man is not a strong character," said Mr. Rhoads. "That doesn't mitigate the crime, but it is the truth. We are all weak in our own ways and we all suffer from those weaknesses."

Mr. Rhoads concluded his statement by saying that he would be aggrieved if the defedant's life were taken and that the ends of justice would be served by life imprisonment.

Replying to a question from the court, McInturf gave his age as forty-four years. He stood before the bench as Judge Endicott pronounced sentence as follows: "I find you guilty of this charge and sntence you to prison for the remainder of your natural life."

McInturf, sobbing, was then led from the court room by Sheriff Morr, to be confined to the county jail until his removal soon to the penitentiary at Michigan City.

New Confession Made

Sheriff Wm. G. Morr and Chas. Davis chief of police of Auburn, had another talk with McInturf at the jail Wednesday evening. They told him they did not believe the story he had been telling that Farver chased him from the Farver barnyard that day, threatening to kill him and attacking him with chunks of wood and a club. They pointed out discrepancies in his story and told him they were satisfied that he shot Farver without warning.

McInturf then went over the happenings of that day and changed the story to a large extent. He said that he went to the Farver place to dig potatoes. After he dug them he went to Farver's house and asked him if he had any sacks to put them in. He got a couple of sacks and the two men went to the patch and put the potatoes into the sacks, tying them up.

"Then," said McInturf, I asked him what part of Waterloo he lived in, because I had a couple of notes that were due that he was on, and he said, up to the center of town, I said, 'That ain't where the boys told me, or where your wife told me. They told me you lived out by the railroad tracks.' And he got mad about it. I don't know what he got mad about. It just made him mad because I wanted to know where he lived. I told him I had to know or I would not know where to come with the notes. Farver said it was none of my business what part of town he lived in.

Farver Accuses Him

"I went and got my empty sacks and Farver said he was going back towards the sugar camp to fix the sugar camp. We were going down the lane and when we got near the woods he spoke about the sow being out in the woods. I didn't know she was out in the woods. It was my sow. We went around the swamp to the right and stopped at the sugar camp. The sugar camp was on the south side of the swamp. I asked him about being over at my place to shoot me one night. He said that if I had waited a little bit he would have shot me. He fixed the door at the sugar camp. He spoke about what the boys told about picking blackberries. That got him madder than ever. He said the boys told him that I had taken his wife out to pick blackberries. After telling about the blackberries he picked up an iron rod that was laying there. I asked him what he was going to do with it. He said, "I'll show you." He started after me and I ran northeast down the road through the woods. I pulled out my gun and he stopped and turned around. He didn't run. He

PERMANENT INSURANCE

"Hurry up with a ladder!"

"We haven't a ladder."

After the fire you'll hear three or four men say, "If I'd had a ladder and a bucket of water right in the start, I could have put the fire out before it did any damage."

No doubt there were several buckets in the neighborhood, and by vigorous pumping the water could have been provided, but what would that have amounted to without a ladder? Buy a good, light ladder, paint it red, and hang it up where anyone can find it at a a moment's notice.

It's even cheaper building material than a fire insurance policy, and it will not expire just when you need it.

DRAMATIC SIDE OF NEWSPAPER LIFE

There frequently is a thrilling side to the business of running a paper, and a newspaper man sometimes has adventures out of the ordinary. It has been made the subject of a number of good novels and plays. We have secured one of these stories, "The Man With Three Names," by the ever popuar writer, Harold MacGrath, and will reproduce it as a serial in The News. Be sure to read it, for it is a charming tale of romance, mystery and love and reveals the exciting phases of the militant newspaper man's career. Starting in the issue of November 24th.

GOV. JACKSON PROCLAIMS NOV. 25, THANKSGIVING DAY

Governor Ed Jackson's Thanksgiving proclamation, calls attention to the universal prosperity in the state and nation and urges that the day be observed throughout the entire state. The proclamation reads:

"Since the landing of our forefathers on the shores of a new world, every year has been marked by a season of Thanksgiving. This beneficial custom has been firmly established, because each year brought additional blessings to elicit our gratitude.

"In the state and nation our temporal welfare has afforded cause for abundant gratefulness.

"Therefore, I, Ed Jackson, Governor of the state of Indiana, in conformity to the proclamation issued by the President of the United States, declare Thursday, Nov. 25, 1926, as Thanksgiving day and urge that all persons in so far as possible observe it as a holiday given over to thanksgiving and prayer that we may properly appreciate the temporal and spiritual blessings that have been so copiously showered upon us."

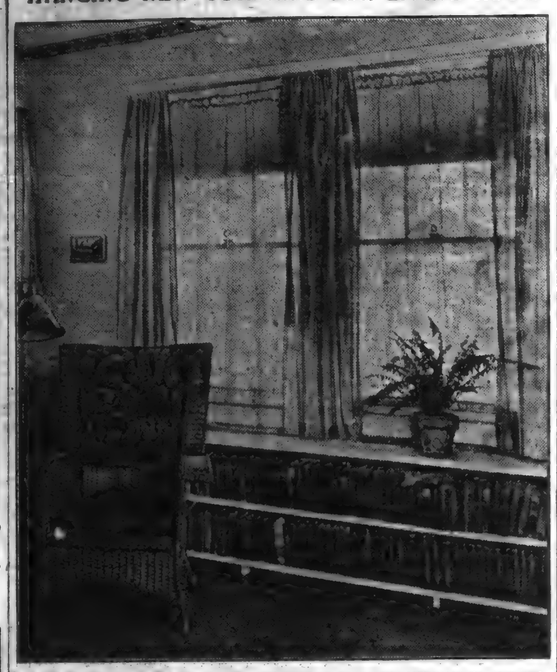
HANGING NEW CURTAINS FOR LIVING ROOM



The Vertical Lines of the Curtains Contrast Agreeably With the Horizontal Lines of the Bookcase.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Curtains like clothes are growing simpler. Gone are the days of swaddling ourselves and our windows with many layers of heavy fabrics. Sunshine and fresh air are getting their chance at us in the house as well as out-of-doors.

Curtains Follow Clothes.

In design, too, curtains have followed clothes. Straight lines are proving as good for windows as for figures, say the home economics specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture. Straight lines also help to increase height or breadth, depending on whether they run up and down or crosswise in curtains as well as dresses. It behooves the woman who wants artistic curtains in her house to look at the shape and size of her windows and think whether the ceiling should be made to appear higher or brought down to a less lofty level. For color she needs to study whether the room gets plenty of sunshine or none at all, and then look at the colors in the walls, floor covering, and furniture.

Must Be Curtained Simply.

Take this picture of a moderate-sized living room in a house of the bungalow type set rather close to the street. The two large windows are the main source of light. They must therefore be curtained simply, but so as to insure some privacy. The wall paper is soft gray, the rug dark gray with mulberry and blue in the border. These same colors appear again in the upholstery on the chair and in brighter shades in the picture over the fireplace. The books in the low shelves under the windows have these same colors and many more. The long horizontal lines of the bookcases have the effect, too, of broadening the windows Bearing all these things in mind, figured cream madras was chosen for glass curtains to cover the windows. The delicate pattern helps to shut out the gaze of the curious from the street, but the fabric is itself so thin that it is an aid in diffusing light. The overdraperies, also of translucent material, are dull blue that serves to emphasize this color in the other furnishings. These draperies are made and hung in the simplest way possible. Their straight vertical lines contrast agreeably with the horizontal lines of the bookcase. They also make the ceiling appear higher and add dignity to the room. Such draperies should always reach to the bottom of the "apron" or window casing, but glass curtains should end at the sill.

GOOD RECIPE FOR A SUNSHINE CAKE

Most Delicate and Delicious of All Confections.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

One of the most delicate and delicious of all cakes is sunshine cake, which is one of the sponge cake group containing a large proportion of eggs and no butter or other fat, says the United States Department of Agriculture. For a good-sized cake you will need six egg whites and three yolks; one cupful of sifted soft wheat or pastry flour; one cupful of sugar; one-half teaspoonful of salt; one teaspoonful of flavoring, and one teaspoonful of cream of tartar. Beat the yolks and whites of the eggs separately, adding half of the salt to the egg whites so that they will beat up very stiff. Add the sugar to the beaten egg yolks and begin adding the flour, to which the cream of tartar has been added. This mixture will be so stiff that you will have to add some of the beaten egg whites for moisture before all of the flour is added. Fold in the egg whites very carefully so as not to release any of the air which you have been so careful to beat in. This air is the only leavening in this kind of cake. Last of all add the flavoring. Pour the batter as soon as it is mixed into a smooth, ungreased tube pan. A tube pan is best for baking a cake.

Test the Oven With a Thermometer to Make Sure It Is Not Too Hot.

LEMON MERINGUE PIE EASILY MADE

Start Should Be Made by Making Undercrust.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Start your lemon meringue pie by making an undercrust. Use your own recipe, or the following one which makes enough for two crusts, one of which may be saved for another day: Sift 1½ cupfuls of soft-wheat or pastry flour with 1 teaspoonful of salt. Work into this about 5½ to 7 tablespoonfuls of fat with the tips of the fingers. Add about 2½ tablespoonfuls of water, or just enough to make the dough correct for rolling. Roll it very lightly. Prebake a single crust at about 450 degrees Fahrenheit until it barely begins to color. Now make the filling separately. You will need 4 tablespoonfuls of lemon juice, 2 tablespoonfuls of cornstarch, 1 cupful of boiling water a pinch of salt, ¾ cupful of sugar, 1 tablespoonful of butter, 2 egg yolks, the grated rind of half a lemon. Mix the sugar, salt and cornstarch together and add it to the boiling water, stirring constantly until the cornstarch is cooked. This will take about 5 or 10 minutes. Now add the lemon juice, grated lemon rind and well-beaten yolks and butter. Cook all together for not more than a minute. Pour into the crust and spread over the top a meringue made by thoroughly beating the 2 egg whites, with 2 tablespoonfuls of sugar added when the egg whites are stiff. Use a wire whisk and beat the whites on a platter to make them light and fluffy. Bake at a low temperature, or about 250 degrees Fahrenheit for 20 minutes, and then raise the temperature until the meringue browns.

Excellent Recipe Given to Make Salmon Loaf

Get a pound of good grade salmon with flaky meat and few small bones. Prepare it by draining off the oil, unless you like its flavor, and picking out all bones and pieces of skin. Break the meat up into fairly small pieces with a fork. Add an equal quantity of soft bread crumbs taken from the center of the loaf. Then add two well-beaten eggs, salt, pepper, chopped parsley, and sufficient milk to moisten, (about ½ cupful). Place in a greased baking dish, mold into a loaf, and bake in a moderate oven until brown. Or, if you wish, you may increase the liquid to 1 cupful, place in greased timbale molds, and bake surrounded by water until firm.

CHAPTER XIV

You Yankees!

When Caleb had discovered the weakness of the rock in Hermanos canyon he looked for another dam site and his intuitive caution had closed his mouth in the matter until Baxter's treachery had sent him on his visit to El Nido the day that Clinton died, ready to make explanations that he felt would exonerate him from Baxter's charges.

He had discovered his alternative in Boca-Blanca basin. Caleb's eyes had seen its possibilities the day of the barbecue and later investigations convinced him that here was his site, better in some ways even than Hermanos. Two creeks ran through it, for one thing, the slopes drained more gently but with sufficient pitch. Clearance work presented no alarming problems or cost.

It was a month after Baxter had been warmingly dismissed by Cox that Hinckley, paying flying visits to his offices between field trips, came into the room where Caleb bent over his drafting and slapped him on the back.

"I've finished my report to the board of directors, Warner," he said jubilantly. "Dictated it this morning. It's entirely favorable. They meet the day after tomorrow. I understand they've practically completed the options for the watershed. All they now have to do is to vote money for purchase and our end of it and then—it's up to the pair of us!" You've earned your hundred thousand dollars, which, I imagine, will be vouchered tomorrow. I wanted to be first with my congratulations. I haven't given you any the best of it in my investigations. Hey, but I'll be glad to buckle down into the harness again! Will you come up to the house to dinner tonight, and talk over things afterward?"

Caleb assented gladly and Hinckley said good-by. He had been gone but a few minutes when a boy arrived with a request for Caleb to see Mr. Cox.

Cox opened the conversation to the point without preamble.

"You've seen Hinckley, Warner? Then you know that his report is favorable. Now, then, we could close up the whole matter at the meeting tomorrow and pass appropriations, but for one thing.

"That's the purchase of the Boca-Blanca basin. We can't get option or purchase price on it out of Wharton, who was handling it. He's stalled me off till yesterday for some reason and I don't like it. He has recently sold it and he says that he has instructions not to disclose the name of the purchaser. Part of the provisions of the deal. We've got to have it to complete the project. You know that. I did not imagine there would be any difficulty. It's valueless land and no one but an engineer would ever imagine it as a reservoir site. Unless there have been more leaks. Did you ever get any line on who owns Boca-Blanca? You found out the owner of the Caliente gravel beds."

"I own the Boca-Blanca basin," said Caleb quietly.

"You do?" Cox's left eyebrow went up.

"I expected to tell you as soon as I knew that Hinckley's report would be favorable. Otherwise my investment would be useless except for realty."

"Your investment?" Cox laid down softly the pencil he was balancing and subjected Caleb to a scathing scrutiny. His demeanor changed. All friendliness left it, the president's face hardened, his jaw shot out and his eyes became again the color of ice in shade. "How much do you want to make on your little—investment?" he demanded.

"I paid ten thousand for the whole valley, bottom to hilltop," said Caleb. "Six thousand in cash—four thousand on a mortgage secured by a five-years' note at six per cent interest.

"I'll turn it over to the company for exactly what it has cost me as soon as my agreement with you is duly ratified upon the acceptance of Hinckley's report. I was in a position to get hold of this property when there was no chance of its value being tilted, at a low price, and I took up the opportunity. I have always intended to deliver it to the company when my own deal was closed."

Cox's face showed faint signs of relief, his eyes were still keen but now they held a quizzical light.

"When your own deal was closed! Had an ace in the hole all the time, eh, Warner? It was you I underestimated. It isn't so often that you find an engineer a first-class business man. You'll go far, Warner. Part of the way with us I'm glad to say."

Caleb flushed a little.

"It was hardly an ace in the hole," he [illegible] I expected [illegible] play it with your hand. I felt that it was a business measure to protect myself, Mr. Cox. I did not doubt your sincerity, but . . ."

"It was a d—d smart move, Warner. You didn't know us. You Yankees!" he chuckled. "I appreciate it, personally and for the company. I mean your turning it over as you will. You could have held us up for a stiff profit and that, too, would have been business. But your New England conscience walks hand-in-hand with your New England forehandedness. You should play a good game of chess. Gad, you've taken a weight off my mind! Wharton and Baxter being so close I began to think that grasshopper had cooked up something, after all. But you blocked it too early in the game, even if he thought of it.

"Tomorrow will see you with your check in hand for a hundred thousand dollars. If you want to invest that in our new stock issue, Warner, I'll see that you can get a block of it. It's coming to you. How about it?"

"I'll think it over, with full appreciation of the offer," said Caleb. "After this project is completed I may want to use my capital in a hurry."

Cox was all cordiality again. It was plain that Caleb's protective purchase of the key to the project appealed to him.

That afternoon Caleb took his deeds to Boca-Blanca out of his safety-deposit drawer at his bank. So far he had won a third of what he desired—the price of his discovery. Now came the work, the enduring sign. There still remained Betty Clinton.

CHAPTER XV

The Work

The rains came sheeting down with blustering winds or days of steady downpour. Caleb was astonished that California weather could be so wild. But they worked. Tarpaulins could keep out the rain, there was no frost, bane of the builder in cement and of the excavator. Caleb dug deep into the gravel beds, although the creeks were running wild, and he was forced to halt at thirty-five feet and wait until spring brought a lowering of the water table to level. He pushed work on the submarine piping. Men swarmed like ants, in busy multitudes.

As the work proceeded toward completion Caleb still found the project good. By June the company began to talk of a ceremonial opening. There would be a picnic-de-luxe, an elaborated barbecue, speeches, general inspection of dam and filtration system. All this was set for August, after a year's top-speed toil.

Caleb was seldom away from the actual scene of labor, he had not seen Betty Clinton, he had seen no one who might have seen or heard of her, but it was not often that thoughts of her were absent from his leisure hours, which were few and apt to find him mentally and physically tired and drowsy.

The year of her mourning would be up with the opening of the works. He hoped—or he would not have dreamed. He hoped to go afield for the next adventure with Betty, to find it for themselves and work out its problems together.

He realized that there had been a change in him. He had expanded and he was no longer the self-contained young engineer who had worked on the projects in New England, beside which this present affair was enormous. He had glimpsed the human side. It was no longer so many yards of excavation, so much concrete, so much flow, levels, logarithms, trigonometry. The personal had entered into the mechanical.

He did not hire the men under his charge. That he left to the company's superintendents and foremen. But he tried to know each by sight and greet them with a nod that recognized them with himself as partners in the work, each according to his measure, capacity. A labor camp had been established in the Sink under canvas and light lumber, bunkhouses, dining rooms and a few concessions all under strict supervision of the company.

It was on Sunday when Caleb, riding over to meet Hinckley at the big dam, passed a man coming out of a little store that carried stationery, candy, tobacco and newspapers and magazines. He had a paper bag tucked into his side pocket, from which he abstracted a sweet morsel for his mouth as Caleb, astride a horse in preference to the car provided by the company, went by him. The man was far from neat, though he wore a linen collar. His clothes were of unusually good material, but they were all out of shape and stained. There was a lack of spirit in the man's carriage that arrested Caleb's attention.

Caleb looked sharply at him. He saw a profiled face framed in an untrimmed beard, a face that was shrunken from sickness or dissipation, a shifting glance of moody eyes, features that seemed remotely familiar.

The sense of having seen the man before persisted and, when Caleb met a foreman, who saluted him cheerily, he drew rein. The man was still in sight.

"Does that chap work for us?" asked Caleb. "I haven't seen him about before." The foreman shaded his eyes.

"He came two weeks ago with a recommend from McCarthy, the contractor, to Mr. Burns. Burns was needin' a timekeeper. He put him on. Name of Johnson. He turns in his sheets well enough. A lushhound gone on the blink with prohibition."

"Well, good luck to you," said Caleb and put his horse to a lope.

McCarthy's name had given him the clew. He was sure Johnson was Baxter. He had heard rumors in his infrequent visits to Golden and the club of the latter's downhill progress. Still drinking bad liquor, borrowing, ejection from the club for a heavy bill, attempts at curbstone real estate, deals in insurance given him by friends, talk of misappropriated premiums and renewal checks, smoothed over for old times' sake.

Caleb's resentment had died out with Baxter's downfall. All that Baxter had attempted against him had ended in failure. If he was attending to his job Caleb did not want to hound him on still lower. But he did not think Baxter's rehabilitation probable.

He kept him in mind until he returned. Then he sought Burns. Johnson's—or Baxter's—record was good enough.

"He's been a boozer," was the super's report. "So far he's kept sober. Want him laid off?"

"Not so long as he keeps off the stuff and turns in correct sheets," said Caleb. "But, if he's drunk, or you think he's carrying liquor, inside or out, fire him. Treat him under the rules the same as anybody."

Two days later Caleb was called to Golden for a conference. As he strolled along, looking in the store windows, his eyes were caught by a placard announcing an exhibition of paintings by Juan Carquinez, canvases of Mexico. Caleb, remembering the picturesque, forceful figure of Carquinez, thought that he would like to see how the man could paint. It would pass an hour pleasantly.

The gallery was a small one. Caleb saw Carquinez talking with a group of three possible patrons, his strong face as mobile in its earnestness as his gestures.

A little pile of catalogues stood on a table by the door and Caleb took one, making the round of the walls, slowly, held before canvas after canvas by the beauty of the work.

Caleb became obsessed with the desire to own one. The name of it was "La Tenaya," and his Spanish was insufficient to translate the word. On a lift of ancient lava that rose in the foreground, looking out across a dusky plain to a line of hills that held the rose and purple of a dying sunset, three Indian women were drawing water from a pocket cistern in the rock, lingering to exchange their simple gossip. A custom as old as the hills themselves, the drawing of water at sunset for the evening meal. It made strong appeal to Caleb, aside from the exquisite painting and tone value of the canvas.

Density of Smoke Is Varied by Distance

The fact that smoke near a smoke stack appears to be dark and then grows lighter and lighter is a good illustration of the law of the inverse square of the distance. At one foot radius from the center of the stack, the surface exposed in any section is very small and the smoke particles very close together, and the passage of light through the particles is almost prevented. The smoke then appears black. At a two-foot radius the particles are twice as far apart and only one-quarter of the area is covered, allowing four times the light to pass through. This section is continuous, and more and more light passes through the smoke particles, causing them to become of a much lighter color against the sky background. At some finite distance from the mouth of the stack separation has been so great that there is practically no more interference with the light and the smoke disappears.

Romance, Inc.

A recent wedding exemplified good selling on the part of the bride's family. Not that they were anxious to part with the daughter—not at all. But they recognized that conditions were right, that the prospective bridegroom was very desirable—so they used, although they knew it not, a subtle, instinctive salesmanship. The bridegroom does not yet realize that the cracking wood fires her father "set" in the fireplace, and the chicken dinners mother provided were well-staged steps in a successful campaign to "make 'em want it!"—Western Advertiser.

POULTRY

SELECT BREEDING STOCK FOR 1927

Early fall is none too early for poultry keepers to make plans for the 1926 breeding stock, says Cora Cooke, poultry specialist with the department of agriculture, University of Minnesota. A Wisconsin authority has said that the selection of breeders should begin as soon as the chicks are hatched.

Miss Cooke says the following requirements should be kept in mind when breeders are being selected: 1, of a pure breed; 2, high vitality; 3, high producing ability as shown by records or examination; 4, right size and type; 5, conforming as nearly as possible to the proper breed and variety characteristics.

"Further information, such as may be obtained by trap-nesting and pedigree, is very valuable," says the specialist. "Absolute knowledge as to how many eggs a hen has laid in her pullet year, how many times she has been broody, and what kind of eggs she lays is a distinct help in selection. But when trap-nesting is not practicable, ordinary examination will achieve results, though in a somewhat smaller degree.

"After selecting the breeders it is important to keep them in the best physical condition for breeding. This calls for comfortable quarters with plenty of room, fresh air and sunshine. The birds should have an ordinary laying ration which will keep them in good flesh without their getting too fat."

Bird Tick Very Serious Menace to Turkey Grower

Dr. W. A. Billings of the agricultural extension service, University of Minnesota, warns turkey growers to be on the lookout for the bird tick which has made its debut in Atkin county, its first appearance in Minnesota. This tick should not be confused with the common Minnesota wood tick or the fowl tick of the Southern states. It has the same general appearance, but is a distinct species.

"The ticks are seen most around the eyes and necks of the young turkeys," says Doctor Billings. "They are very destructive and in one outbreak killed 40 out of 46 poults. There is no successful treatment. The only thing that can be done is to go over the birds once or twice a week by hand and pick off the ticks.

"It is possible these parasites were introduced into Minnesota from wild fowl or through the interchange of breeding stock from other states. The tick appeared in Vermont in 1900."

Teach Chicks to Roost as Early as Possible

As soon as possible chicks should be taught to roost. After they roost the dangers of crowding or piling in the corners is eliminated and a great problem of the poultry keeper is nearing solution. At the earliest opportunity roosts should be installed a foot or eighteen inches above the floor along the back of the house so as to encourage roosting. One should carefully observe the chicks and always provide an abundance of roosting space. The brooder house should be supplied with fresh air so as to afford comfort to the chicks. This discourages their roosting in trees. A good rule is to get the chicks on the roost at the earliest age possible.

Discrimination Against Eggs in Cold Storage

An interesting argument has been going on recently over the question, "When Is an Egg Fresh?" Undue discrimination against eggs that have been kept in cold storage has aroused butter and egg dealers to an effort to change the public attitude. One suggestion is that storage eggs should be labeled "Kept Fresh in Cold Storage." It is pointed out that eggs which are placed in cold storage are of the finest quality, being produced in the spring, and may actually be better after several months of keeping than others which are fresh in the present use of that term.

Roosts for Turkeys

A great many of the turkey growers build the roosts about 10 or 12 feet high for the large turkeys and about 5 or 6 feet high for the young ones; around these roosts is built a 6-foot fence with a large gate. When the turkeys get their feed and drink on return from the fields they are driven into this enclosure and the gate shut; in this way dogs, coyotes and other animals are kept away and the turkeys are amply protected against thieves.

Spray for Mites

Mites live in the house, laying low in the daytime, and swarming over the hens at night, sucking their blood and poisoning their sleep with evil dreams. The best way to put a crimp in their game is, first, to scrub the house out thoroughly with strong soapsuds, then spray the walls, roosts and everything else in the house, with a 3 per cent solution of some good coal-tar disinfectant. Repeat the spraying in three or four days and keep the house clean.

AROUND THE HOME

Reclaiming Your Rugs

How all the old-fashioned industries and activities have been taken out of the home and turned over to commercial enterprise, haven't they! There is scarcely one of the home activities—whether making new articles or refashioning from scraps and leftovers—that isn't done better, more cheaply, and infinitely more quickly by the modern factory. Of course these machine products do not have the personal, hand-made touch that the heirlooms made by our grandmothers possess; but the modern woman has little time in which to make the braided mats, candlewick counterpanes and patchwork quilts produced in the olden days when there was more time than anything else!

The newest form of commercial making-over that I know of is the reclaiming of old carpets, rugs and clothing materials, and turning them into attractive new rugs of any size dyed to one's chosen color and finished in either a plain solid surface or two-toned with a wide border. We all know how successfully the government reclaimed old uniforms, blankets, army shirts, and other garments during the war, and how entirely clean, sanitary, and durable such reclaimed articles can be.

The firm which reclaims our ragged, faded, and torn carpets, rugs, and portieres—otherwise useless, performs what sounds like a domestic miracle. Into the maw of their special patented process goes the shabby, the worn, and the washed out. There the material is first reduced to shreds, then washed, sterilized, carded, color is schemed, and lastly it is woven into a thick, seamless, reversible rug into which the foot sinks luxuriously.

It seems to me this is a brilliant idea on the part of the manufacturers. How many things we throw away because we are unable to utilize the portions that are still worth keeping! To bundle up all our old coats, ancient parlor carpets, dreary chenille portieres, outgrown couch covers, and ragged pieces of upholstery, and have them return to us in the shape of a handsome taupe or blue rug for the dining room or bedroom—well, it seems like magic and nothing less! The rug comes back within the week, too, and the price is less than you would think.

Confusion in a Handbag

The pretty shopper paused at the dress-goods counter, held the clerk's attention with an appealing glance (for another woman was trying to get waited on first), and groped in her beaded bag for her sample. The clerk obligingly waited for a moment, but alas! the shopper groped in vain. She drew out a daintily colored handkerchief, a card case, a powder compact, a theater-ticket envelope, a coin-purse, a nail-file, two letters, and a shopping list, but no scrap of blue georgette. She cast a despairing glance at the clerk, but that damsel had turned to the other customer. In the end the shopper had to pile all the contents of her bag out onto a sequestered corner of the counter before she found the sample—which had slipped in between the two letters!

Now, I'm not recommending bunches of pockets all over our slim persons to hold our plunder, nor do I advocate carrying one powder puff or card case less. We women simply have to have all our small accessories with us and we have no other place to carry them than in our handbags. What we can do, however, is to arrange the contents of our bags so that we can find what we want without taking everything out!

A woman I know divides her handbag into a number of silk partitions or envelopes. Five or six pieces of silk just the shape of the bag, and a tiny bit larger, all round, are sewed together on all sides, leaving the tops open. These tops are finished with tiny bands of gold galoon, as her bag is of black and gold. When the packet of partitions is stitched firmly together, it is bound with a narrow bias band, machine stitched, and the whole packet is firmly sewed to the inner seam of the lining.

In one of these envelopes she places her handkerchief and her coin-purse; in another she keeps her nail-file, compact, and lip-stick. Still another holds her card case and a small leather case holding her commutation ticket and theater tickets, a pencil and a small memorandum book containing addresses and telephone numbers. A fourth is free for samples, shopping list, or letters (the "extras" of the lay).

CHARGES THAT WIFE NEGLECTED WORK

Vera I. Washler not only failed to make a comfortable home for him, but abandoned him, Donald A. Washler, a Concord township farmer asserts in a divorce complaint filed in the DeKalb circuit court.

The couple was married May 4, 1923. The plaintiff says his wife was indifferent to her household duties, failing to wash the dishes, make the beds, cook the meals or keep the house clean. She was away from home much of the time and sought the association of questionable persons, according to her husband. She told him she did not care for him and indicated she thought more of other men.

Finally, on last September 30 the defendant left her husband's home and he found a note from her in which she said she didn't intend to return. He thinks she is now in Ohio.

Let's take a ride!

by Lawrence Hawthorne

Reverberating through the hills,
Resounding far across the plains,
There often comes a call that thrills
My heart—a call that always gains
Intensity as moments fly—
"Come, take a ride! Oh, take a ride!"
And, though with earnestness I try
To work, it will not be denied.

From distant highways, rich with views
Of nature's artistry and grace,
Through city parks and avenues,
This urgent summons I can trace;
Yet valiantly I labor here,
Attempting to complete a rhyme—
I make my answer brief but clear:
"I'd like to, but I haven't time!"

Then comes this call: "My dear, I say
We certainly should be outside!
Just see, it's such a lovely day—
Oh, can't you come? Let's take a ride!"
And then four boys attack their Dad
With arguments both true and tried,
Until they get me fightin' mad—
So mad I give 'em all a ride!

THANKSGIVING TURKEYS TO BE HIGHER

Thanksgiving turkey eating will be somewhat more costly this year than in the past two years, according to a holiday prediction.

The turkey crop is not as large as it was ast year or the year before, and a prediction of 45 to 48 cents a pound for this year's Thanksgiving turkey is not considered pessimistic.

The cool weather this fall has been favorable "turker weather." So long as the days and nights are comparatively warm, turkeys continue to roam the country and fail to put on flesh. When the temperature falls, they are content to cease wandering off, and settle down to grain feeding which rapidly adds pounds of turkey meat. The crop generally is further advanced than at this time in several years, and reports from the country consistently tell of the high quality of the turkeys. In Texas, which is the big early state for turkeys, the crop is belived to exceed last year when many of the young poults were lost during the hot dry summer. Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, Iowa and Ohio are expected to have fewer turkeys for the market this season while the other states report flocks of about the same size as last year.

Stocks of turkeys in storage are less than half as large as at this time a year ago and 40 per cent below the five-year average. Reserves of frozen turkeys, therefore, will be less of a market factor this season than last. Holdings of chickens and fowls are five million pounds larger than a year ago and ten million pounds larger than the five-year average, however, offsetting to some degree the decline in turkeys.

FAILING TO VOTE MAKES REGISTRATION NECESSARY

As a result of the light vote at the election Tuesday, the names of more than 40 per cent of the eligible voters of DeKalb county were removed automatically from the registration books. Before these voters can vote at the presidential election in 1928 it will be necessary for them to register that year.

The poll list of the persons who voted Tuesday will be the basis of persons entitled to vote at the 1928 election, and all those who voted will be entitled to cast their ballots again in 1928 without further registration unless in the meantime they move out of the precincts in which they now live.

The total vote cast Tuesday for United States senator, long term, was 9,150, whie the registration books contained 15,551 names. This leaves about 6,400 who must register in 1928 in order to vote for president.

It is possible that the legislatnre meeting in January will make further changes in the registration law.

A QUICKER WAY TO END COLDS!

To quickly break up a cough or cold, it is necessary to do two things:

1—Get rid of phlegm. 2—Heal irritation in lining of throat, chest and bronchial tubes.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral accomplishes this by its powerful double action. It cuts away phlegm because its medication penetrates through and through the linings of throat, chest and bronchial tubes. You feel almost instant relief, all the way down. Then it is absorbed into the irritated membranes, just as ink soaks into a blotter. As its soothing, healing properties are absorbed by the membranes themselves, it stops the cough, breaks up the cold and brings prompt, lasting relief.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is hospital-proved. Prescribed by physicians. Pleasant to taste. 60c and, twice the quantity, $1.00, at all druggists.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 83

"Purges" and "Physics" Bad for Old Folks

While Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, knew that constipation was the curse of advancing age, he did not believe that a "purge" or "physic" every little while was necessary.

To him, it seemed cruel that so many constipated old people had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to "regulate" the bowels of old folks. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes a gentle, easy bowel movement but each dose helps to strengthen the bowel muscles, shortly establishing natural "regularity." It never gripes, sickens, or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take.

If past fifty, buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine or write "Syrup Pepsin," Monticello, Illinois, for a FREE SAMPLE BOTTLE and just see for yourself.

Clean Kidneys By Drinking Lots of Water

Take Salts to Flush Kidneys if Bladder Bothers or Back Hurts

Eating too much rich food may produce kidney trouble in some form, says a well-known authority, because the acids created excite the kidneys. Then they become overworked, get sluggish, clog up and cause all sorts of distress, particularly backache and misery in the kidney region, rheumatic twinges, severe headaches, acid stomach, constipation, torpid liver, sleeplessness, bladder and urinary irritation.

The moment your back hurts or kidneys aren't acting right, or if bladder bothers you, begin drinking lots of good water and also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any good pharmacy; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity; also to neutralize the acids in the system so that they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts can not injure anyone; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which millions of men and women take now and then to help keep the kidneys and urinary organs clean, thus often avoiding serious kidney disorders.

FROCK FOR DANCE OR PARTY; COMFORTABLE AND STYLISH COATS

SLEEVES it is, at the present moment, on which fashion's flashlight is being focused. Even the hitherto sleeveless dance and party frock has yielded to the lure of ornate sleeves. Lacking adjectives to do justice to the subject of the new sleeves, here is a picture which will eloquently tell of at least one pair of sleeves whose transcendent charm makes a lovely gown still more lovely.

If Marion Nixon, that dainty star of filmdom, should wear this airy-fairy frock in which she here poses in one of her plays, an admiring audience would be pardoned for mistaking her for a lovely butterfly fluttering its gauzy wings across the screen. The bodice in this exquisite dress of pale-yellow chiffon is somewhat form-fitting which, by the way, is characteristic of the youthful party frock. The skirt ripples and ripples in its circular fullness. The sleeves are wide enough at the bottom to give the effect of a transparent cape. Answering to the mode's call for much elaboration they are heavily garnitured with varicolored flowers formed of ribbon and tinsel. Long ends of lavender ribbon fall to the bottom of the skirt, topped with a ribbon-flower motif at the waistline.

An Airy-Fairy Party Frock.

Upon the sleeve, be the frock of a formal or informal type, style creators are lavishing their richest gifts of design and handcraft. Not only does the silhouette express extreme novelty, but the decorative note displays intriguing artistry. Answering the demand for ornateness are vivid georgette sleeves worn with the black velvet frock. These are enriched with embroidery applique and paillettes.

More luxurious in texture, more radiantly colorful grow the new plaid cloakings. Well may one vision the snowy winter landscape enlivened by coats whose plaided materials introduce such a wealth of color into the picture.

Commensurate with the entrancing beauty of the woolen fabric is the picturesque styling of these plaid coats. Particularly does the cape add charm to the silhouette, especially if it is as graceful as is the one shown in the picture. This is one of the latest and most approved coat types. It is of brown and tan plaid with a beige caracul collar, the long flaring cape falling to a point at the hem of the coat.

The high fur collar, which meanders down each side of the front opening to the very bottom of the coat, is fashion's proud boast this season. Hudson seal thus disposed, with broad cuffs to match, gives to the plaid coat an air of patrician style.

Woolens of deep soft nap in vivid bayadere stripes are also very smartly fashioned in conjunction with lavish fur trimming. For the trimming of these, long-haired, showy furs vie with the smoother pelts. Conspicuously classed with the former is red fox, a fur very widely exploited both on sports and dress models. In the flat furs spotted leopard adds its spectacular charm both as lining and trimming.

A Luxurious Plaid Coat.

Modish fur details for the gay woolen coats stress huge novel cuffs and immense pockets, the latter oddly set so as to bespeak a convincing style individuality.

CALEB'S FAITHFULNESS REWARDED

LESSON TEXT—Josh. 14:6-14.

GOLDEN TEXT—I wholly followed the Lord my God.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Brave Spy Rewarded.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Reward of Service.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Caleb, the Courageous.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Blessings That Follow Wholehearted Obedience.

I. Elements of Caleb's Character.

1. Independence of spirit (Num. 13:30).

Though the multitude clamored to follow the report of the ten, Caleb determined to stand alone. This is an element in human character which is highly important. One should stand for what he knows to be right, regardless of the sentiment of the crowd.

2. True to convictions (Josh. 14:8, cf. Num. 14:6-9).

What Caleb knew and felt he spoke out. He did not wait for the opinion of others and then modify his to suit the populace. A true man and one who can be trusted will be loyal to his convictions.

3. Unselfish (14:12).

He did not ask for some easy place. He did not wish to thrust someone else into the place of difficulty. He wanted to go into the place where it would require fighting in order to drive out the giants which were in the land.

4. Courageous (Josh. 14:12, cf. 13:30).

This courage he displayed when he insisted that they were able to go up from Kadesh-Barnea and take possession of the land. Forty-five years have elapsed since that time. He would be considered an old man now, but still he desired that place for an inheritance which would require some fighting. He said, "I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me, as my strength was then, even so is my strength now for war."

5. Loyalty to God (Josh. 14:8, cf. Numb. 14:24).

He served God with a whole-hearted devotion; indeed, this is the way to his character.

II. Caleb Laying Claim to His Inheritance (vv. 6-12).

Caleb did not come alone to make his claim. He came in the presence of the children of Judah, lest he be suspicioned of taking advantage. He did not wish to wait until after the lot was cast, for God had already given a certain portion to him. It were useless to ask God to decide a matter which He had already determined. The basis of his plea was:

1. The ground of his service (vv. 6-8).

He had endangered his life in spying out the land—had gone to Hebron when the giants were there. He brought back a true report when his brethren were all against him. He bore his testimony and insisted that they go up and take the land though to do so incurred the displeasure of his brethren and necessitated his standing practically alone.

2. On the ground of the oath of Moses to him (v. 9).

Joshua had respect for Moses, and was bound to follow the counsels of his faithful master whom he had succeeded. This plea was effective.

3. On the ground of God's providential dealing with him (vv. 10-12).

God had preserved him in bodily health. Though he was now eighty-five years old, his natural forces were not abated. He said, "I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me, as my strength was then even so is my strength now for war."

III. Joshua Giving the Inheritance to Caleb (13:14, 15).

1. Joshua blessed Caleb (v. 13).

He not only acquiesced in Caleb's claim, but bestowed the blessing of God upon him in it.

2. The inheritance given (vv. 13, 14).

Hebron was the name of the inheritance. The name Hebron means fellowship. It was given because Caleb had fully followed the Lord. Only those who fully follow the Lord can enjoy fellowship with Him. Though Caleb now legally possessed Hebron, it was necessary for him to fight to drive out the giants who infested it. In Christ we have an inheritance which God has given us. We, too, must fight because the enemy is unwilling to relinquish his claim upon it.

Believing in Christ

Many men do not believe in Christ because they do not want to do what Christ demands of them. Their doubts are not intellectual, as they pretend, but practical. They deny Christ so as to escape obligation and effort.—Young People.

Getting Nowhere

Have you heard of the old colored woman's experience with a Merry-Go-Round? She said: "I rid that thing a heap, but after all I didn't git nowhar."

It is a good deal that way with people who do not save a little from their earnings. They spend a lot of money, but financially, they get "nowhar." With your savings placed in a reliable Bank like ours you will in time reach a position of financial independence.

McINTURF GIVEN LIFE SENTENCE

only took about a step and I shot him in the back. He didn't fall at first. I ran to him and he got hold of my left arm. We went down on our knees struggling. Then I shot him in the head. He fell then. I shot him in the head after he fell.

"I carried him twenty-five or thirty feet and laid him down. I picked up the iron rod and hid it along the fence and went home. He was not struggling when I left him in the woods. When I left I thought he was dead. This was around 11:30. I stopped on the way to the house and washed my arm at a little wet place along the road. The clothes I had on had no blood on them except on my arm. I went home and ate my dinner.

"I went back that night about 6:30 and dragged and carried him to the house. When I went back to the woods he was lying on his back the same as when I had left him. I don't know what made me move the body. I put him in the car. I never put him in a wagon at all. I got his pocketbook that night when I took him to the well. I took some stuff off him before I put him in the car. That included his coat, his vest and his watch and his bank book and a few papers, which I burned. I don't know why I didn't burn all the papers. Some I hid in the garage.

Dragged the Body

"I dragged his body from the car to the well. I took the body by the feet to move it. His head was on the ground. I remember putting him in the well. I heard him strike the water. I hadn't seen that well since last winter when I was hunting over that way.

"I never thought once about killing Forrest Farver unless he might get me in a corner.

"There was $12.32 or $12.22 in Farver's pocketbook. I gave Mrs. Farver $10 of that money on Wednesday afternoon when she came to my place in company with Homer Bowers. Homer and his wife saw me give her the money.

"At one time when I was talking with Mrs. Farver before Farver was killed she said she would not blame me if I killed him. She said he might as well be shot as to shoot somebody else. I told her I hadn't slept a night since he was over there to my place at midnight."

McInturf told the officers last Sunday that he had hidden the pocketbook in the granary, but it could not be found there. He admitted Wednesday night that he placed it in the cellar, on a joist near the ceiling. He was taken by the sheriff and his deputy, Arden Morr, and Mr. Davis to the farm Thursday morning at 6 o'clock and he recovered the pocketbook. He said that when Mrs. Farver and Mr. and Mrs. Bowers were looking for Farver the day after his disappearance Mrs. Farver said she needed some money and so he gave her $10. She did not know it was her dead husband's money that McInturf was giving her.

McInturf, in the light of the new confession, was taken by the officers to the scene of the killing. He showed them where he had placed the old buggy axle with which he said Farver had threatened him. Going over the events of that ill-fated morning again, McInturf admitted that Farver did not struggle with him after the first shot was fired, as he related Wednesday night. He confessed that he shot him in the back; that Farver fell and he shot him once more in the head.

Receiver is Appointed

After McInturf had been in court Thursday morning his landlord, Solomon Shearer of Auburn, and his attorneys, Link & McClintock, were allowed to confer with him in the law library. McInturf had lived on the Shearer farm of sixty acres since March, 1921. They own the crops in partnership and part of them have not been harvested. McInturf agreed that Mr. Shearer should do whatever was advisable to handle the crops.

Mr. Shearer filed a petition with the court for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the crops. Lewis E. Freman was appointed and his bond was fixed at $2,000.

James W. May, son of George Calvin and Mary May, was born August 7, 1845 at Demark, Morrow County, Ohio, and departed this life Sunday evening, October 24, 1926, at the age of 81 years, 2 months and 17 days. His death was caused by pneumonia after an illness of ten days. James W. May came to DeKalb County shortly after the Civil War and settled in Concord Township. He was united in marriage to Harriett E. Layman, who departed this life May 31, 1911. To this union seven children were born. Two of which died in infancy and his eldest daughter, Eva Feller, died at his home in Auburn just seventeen months ago, on May 28, 1925. The departure of his daughter was a terrible shock to the father from which he had never fully recovered. Four children remain to mourn the bereavment of a loving and devoted father, Frank May of Auburn, Mrs. Fidelis E. Feller of Fort Wayne, Alva Curtis May of Canton, Ohio, and Mrs. Viola N. Coe of Sacramento, Cal. He is also survived by nine grandchildren, two great grandchildren and one sister, Mrs. Harriet Hobson, of Fort Wayne.

James W. May has lived in Auburn for about twenty years, until the death of his eldest daughter. Since the time he has lived with his daughter, Mrs. Fidelis E. Feller of Fort Wayne. Before he moved to Auburn he resided on a farm in Concord Township. Soon after the Civil War he united with the old Concord church and was a member of the building committee of the Fairview church He has been a constant student of the Bible and loved and read it until his vision became dim. He was a man of prayer and in his recent illness when he realized that death was near he said, "I have given up all hope and I am ready to go home." His last hours were spent in communion with his Heavenly Father.

The deceased lived a long and useful life and one of his great outstanding characteristics was his patriotism and devotion to his and our country. The principles for which he fought and bled during the Civil War. He served his country in two enlistments, both in the cavalry and infantry. He enlisted first in Company B. Independent Battalion of Ohio Cavalry and at the close of a years service he enlisted in Company I of the 38th Ohio Infantry. He was in General Sherman's march from Atlanta to the sea, and one of his favorite songs was, "Marching Through Georgia." This he sang for his daughter and children not long before he died. He was woundeed at the battle of Tar Flat lying on the battle field for thirty six hours before he was taken to the hospital.

We cannot honor these grand veterans of the Civil War too much. When we were children we looked upon a long line of the Civil War veterans as they marched in the Memorial Day Parade. Some were crippled, some wore coats with an empty sleeve. The step was keen to the drum corps. But they have been rapidly passing down the valley one by one. It will be just a few short years until as living beings we can honor them no more. But the principles for which they fought and bled can never be forgotten. All honor to them. Mr. May was longing for Auburn where he could spend his last days with his many friends and meet with his companions in the Grand Army of the Republic.

In the passing of this, another noble veteran of the Civil War, there will be a host of friends and neighbors that will miss his kindly disposition won for him the high esteem of both the old and the young.

As for his loved ones words cannot tell of their heart ache in their bereavement. A loving and devoted father has been called home and they are left to mourn his loss. Since the death of their mother, as a faithful father, he has tried to fill her place in the care and attention of the children and grandchildren. May the Heavenly Father give them grace to sustain this loss and may they be able to say, "The Lord gave and the Lord has taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord." Their loss is his gain.

Funeral services were held at the St. Joe M. P. Church, on Wednesday afternoon, two weeks ago. Rev. McKnight officiated. Burial was made at the St. Joe cemetery.

LEAVES PROPERTY TO WIFE UNLESS SHE WEDS AGAIN

The late George Howey of Spencerville, who died October 28, left all his property to his wife, Lucinda Howey, for her use during her natural life providing she remains unmarried.

Then the property is to be divided equally among the seven children, who are Frank and Alvin Howey of Guthrie Center, Ia., Clara Clark of Fort Wayne, Wallace Howey of Auburn, Eddie Howey of East Haven hospital and Melvin H. and Myrtle Howey of Spencerville; excepting that Myrtle Howey is to receiive $500 more than her equal share, and $200 is to be kept out of the equal share of Edward Howey to pay his funeral expenses and for clothing.

Melvin H. Howey is nominated by his father for executor and it is stipulated that if any of the heirs object to the terms of the will he or she shall receive $5 only

The will was executed with William Allen and Henry Beams as witnesses. The will is not dated.

The estate consists of $1,500 in personal property and $5,000 in real estate.

Melvin H. Howey qualified to act as executor by filing $3,000 bond, with Clara Clark, Wallace Howey and C. A. Howey as sureties.

PROGRESS MADE IN REDUCING U. S. BONDED DEBT

Summarizing from statements made October 6th and 11th by Mr. Winston, Under Secretary of the Treasury; just after the close of the War the Treasury was spending at the rate of a billion dollars every two weeks. In seven years since 1919 to 1926, the debt has been reduced 28 per cent. In seven years after the Civil War the debt was reduced 22 per cent. There has been no greater burden on the taxpayer by reducing the World War debt nearly six billion than by reducing the Civil War debt six hundred million. Our treasury constantly purchases its own issues in large amounts for various more or less permanent funds. With the annual surplus of the treasury during the past seven years, an aggregate of $2,056,000,000 debt was retired. A sinking fund absorbs increasing amounts each year, and will continue to do so until the last bond outstanding has been retired. That fund, appropriated primarily each year from taxes, will suffice to retire the entire debt even though the allied foreign debt repayments to us fail to materialize as now prescribed. To date that sinking fund has retired about $1,750,000,000 and foreign payments have retired about $500,000,000. The total debt from its peak ($26,594,267,878 on August 31, 1919) has been reduced about $7,000,000,000, to date.

There appears to be no certainty that the schedule of payments by all the various foreign governments will continue to be made in full throughout two coming generations. Further modifications, reductions, and possible cancelation will probably be effected for various unprophesiable reasons and prove to be mutually beneficial for the economic welfare of all concerned, without reacting in the slightest upon our own national prosperity. In quoted language of the Brittish Chancellor of Exchequer—"It is incredible that world opinion on war debts will not change before three generations have passed."

We cannot criticize Europe if its nations are not on their feet eight years after the World War. We, too, suffered inflation of currency after all major wars, and not until fourteen years after the Civil War did we resume specie payments and recover from currency inflation and deflation. A like period of time granted to Europe would extend to 1932. European nations are taxing and collecting from their people a larger proportion of the total income of their nations than we are paying in this country.

"If the French franc should now be stabilized at 3c, the French government will have taken four-fifths of the value of the loans made to it by its own people," which is an enormous capital tax, tantamount to confiscation. We should bear that in mind when we discuss the burden the French people have to bear.

NATURE'S BOUNTY TO BE SHOWN AT CHICAGO

Agriculture in all her glory will hold court at the world's farm capitol the week following Thanksgiving when the International Live Stock Exposition will celebrate its 27th anniversary at the Chicago Union Stock Yards, November 27 to December 4. According to Secretary-Manager B. H. Heide, who has successfully conducted this greatest of all agricultural shows for over a quarter of a century, the approaching session will be the most completely balanced exhibition ever staged in its illustrious history.

For months the foremost breeders have been grooming their finest beef cattle, horses, sheep and hogs for the supreme test of the year at this acknowledged "Court of Last Resort." Champions from every large stock show on the continent will meet to decide the final honors of the season, many of them clashing here for the first time. The concentrated blood of generations of breeding will be gathering together in one great dazzling display of animal perfection.

The International Grain and Hay Show will include around 5,000 samples of grains, small seeds and hay selected from the choicest crops of the United States and Canada. Practically every state and province will be represented in this department.

An army of 1,200 farm youths, picked from 650,000 Boys' and Girls' Club members, will attend the Fifth National Club Congress, compete in contests and give demonstrations in their own building on the Exposition grounds.

Educational exhibits of the Department of Agriculture and state colleges will deal with such timely subjects as the corn borer menace. Brilliant evening entertainments, Horse Show, Meat Shoppe, judging contests, auctions, organization meetings and many other events will crowd each day's program. Reduced rates on all railroads will allow thousands to visit this great gathering of the basic industry.

BIG APPLE CROP TO BOOST U. S. HEALTH

Amrica should have its healthiest year in 1927, if the old adage about apples and health still holds. The estimated apple crop for this year is more than 234,000,000 bushels, which is the largest crop since 1914 and the third largest in the history of the United States. Because the 1926 production is fully one-third larger than last year, apple prices have dropped to the lowest point in years and give promise of remaining at a low level throughout the season.

Practcally all of the increased production of the commercial apple crop this year was made in the East, the principal apple orchard secton of the country. Here favorable conditions prevailed throughout the growing season, although some sections reporte the crop as maturing later than usual. The crop in the northwest, the only other important commercial apple section in the country, however, suffered severely from freezing in late September with the result that yields were mater-

The export trade is likely to af-

The export trade is likely to affect the apple market to some extent. While increased consumption in England, one of the big consumers of American apples, is not expected this year because of the continued unemployment which is keeping the buying power of the country low, Germany, another of the biggest consumers, is taking more American apples than the year before. Improvements n the purchasing power of the German people and reduced apple crops in European countries which compete with the United States in the German apple market are given as the reasons for this year's increase in the American apple trade with that country.

TIME OF ANNUAL PEST HUNT NEARS

Since the organization of the St. Joe Fish and Game Protective Association, there has been a great interest in the annual pest hunt, at which time the membership participating is divided with captains, and an agreed score of points for the pests caught, the losing side to banquet the winners.

At the last meeting the membership decided that each member participating in the hunt, deposit $1.00 with either member of the following committee: Ralph Sechler, F. R. Bowman or Wilbur Yeiser. This guarantees sufficient funds for the banquet and no farther financial responsibility is placed upon the committees.

At the next meeting, Dec. 3, final arrangements will be made for the hunt to commence Dec. 20 and run until Saturday evening, Dec. 25. All money is to be paid in by Dec. 3.

DEKALB COUNTY IN QUARANTINE AREA

State Entomologist Will Ask Ban On Sale Of Corn To Be Effective Within Next Ten Days

Federal quarantine of all of DeKalb and Steuben counties and parts of Whitley, Noble, LaGrange and Allen counties, including Fort Wayne, will be asked by Frank N. Wallace, state entomologist, when he goes to Washington, to attend a hearing before the Federal horticultural board on the European corn borer situation in Indiana. Mr. Wallace said that he will ask even a more extensive quarantine than Federal authorities working in Indiana have proposed.

The quarantine is expected to go into effect within ten days after the boundaries of the borer-infested area are fixed by Federal authorities and will mean that no corn on the cob may be shipped from the quarantine area. Only shelled corn will be permitted taken out.

This restriction is placed so that the borer can not spread to other sectons of the state and country. Borers are sometimes found in the cobs, although they usually destroy the stalks first, according to Mr. Wallace.

The decision to include Fort Wayne in the quarantined area was reached, according to Mr. Wallace, after discussion with agricultural leaders in Allen county and with Fort Wayne officials. This will enable farmers and growers of market products to sell sweet corn in Fort Wayne next spring, he pointed out.

Farmers throughout the northeastern section of the state are being urged to destroy every particle of corn stalk this fall in the fight against the pest. The stalks should either be burned, plowed under or shredded, he said, so that every insect will be destroyed and will not be able to reproduce next spring.

One of the methods being used in the fight is that of taking representative groups of farmers from each of the infested counties on trips of two days' duration into the infested area in Canada where they see for themselves the ravags student vote after first having turn to their respective counties where their missionary work among other farmers is being found invaluable.

HURT IN AUTO ACCIDENT SUNDAY

Bert Provines aged twenty-two years, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Perry Provines of Jackson township, was still unconscious Monday mornng from injuries which he received Sunday when the automobile which he was driving was side swiped another car on the Leo road, eight miles north of Fort Wayne.

Provines and two companions were on their way to Auburn when the accident occurred. Provines was taken to the St. Joseph hospital suffering from severe lacerations on the face, the other two young men escaning with minor hurts.

INDIANA ACTIVE AT INTERNATIONAL

Purdue University, Lafayette, will stage an educational exhibit of timely interest at the International Live Stock Exposition in Chicago, November 27th to December 4th. The three different sections of the display will be in the charge of Dr. G. N. Hoffer, Lynn Robertson and John Schwab of the Agricultural Extension Department. The University will also exhibit two exact minature reproductions of a Southern Indiana farm showing its condition in 1920 and how it has been improved to date by experts from the Agricultural College.

H. D. WEAVER TAKES CHARGE OF ESTATE

Hervey D. Weaver of Auburn, was on Thursday appointed in the DeKalb circuit court as administrator of the estate of the late Forest E. Farver, who was murdered October 26 by Charley McInturf of Jackson towaship.

The application for Mr. Weaver's appointment was filed by Farver's father, John H. Farver of Steuben county. He estimates the value of his son's personal property at $'00 and that of his real estate at $800. The heirs are the widow, Laila Farver, and four children. John R. and Jacob L. Farver, twins, 14, Luella, 10, and Carrie, aged nineteen months.

TO TRANSFER ELECTRIC FRANCHISE

Monday, a representative of the Goshen Electric Light and Power Co., was in town going over the records of the town board investigating the contract under which they are now buying current for the town. It is expected that soon, the Ohio Power Co., will transfer their Indiana business to the Indiana company. The contract for St. Joe was made in 1912 with C. M. Lott of Hicksville on basis of ten years while the franchise was for 25 years. At the present time the current is being bought under the original contract, although it has expired.

Just what this change will mean to consumers is not known, but there will be no raise in rates until authorized by the Public Service Commission.

LOUD SPEAKER MAKES APPEARANCE THIS WEEK

Voume 2, Nnmber 1, is now being circulated by the High School students. It comes to the reading public in magazine form with a four page printed cover, and the news matter is mimeographed on an 8½x11 sheet and inserted. It is the plan to issue every two weeks and sell for twenty cents.

The staff for the year 1926-1927 follows:

Editor-in-chief, Harriet Wasson; Assistants, Gobel Goodwin and Dorothy Ginther; Alumni and Local, Martha Woodcox; Humerous and Exchange, Hazel Storer; Sports, George Simanton; Business, Manager, Bernard Sechler; Assistant, Frank Miser; Circulation Manager, Priscilla Borthwick; Assistant, Victor Coburn.

Two of the officers, the Editor-in-chief and the Business Manager were appointed by the faculty, while the remainder were electd by student vote after first having been proposed, together with some other nominees, by a nominating committe. Others deserving mention are the binders: Beatrice Woodcox, Hilda Morr, Thelma Curie and Bonnell Baker; printers, Edward Kimes and Eugene Harman and typists, Viola Coburn and Marguerite Goodwin, all of whom were chosen by the staff.

The paper is entirely a student project; the writing, making of the stencils, printing and binding are all done by the students.

The motive for publishing this school paper are many, a few of which are: developing a school spirit, promoting of interest in composition and journalism and to keep the alumni and patrons in touch with the school activities.

No one can know the condition of his eyes

Without undergoing an examination. No one can tell anything about the eyes merely by looking at them. They must be examined by instruments that detect the slightest deviation from normal. So there is very little use asking anyone if his eyes are normal. He doesn't know. But our examination would tell him. Then we could correct the defects we found.

LIVER AND BACON COOD FOR DINNER

Combination May Well Be Served Late in Day.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In many parts of the country it has been customary to regard liver as a breakfast dish. According to present-day ideas about foods, however, there are at least two good reasons why the favorite combination of liver and bacon may well be reserved for dinner. For one thing, many people are not demanding the heavy type of breakfast that was eaten years ago. Meat and potatoes, doughnuts, pie and other hearty foods have been superseded by lighter fare. Breakfast in many households now consists of fruit, cereal, eggs variously prepared, bread in some form, and coffee or cocoa.

Secondly, liver is one of the most important meats in regard to the protein and calories it furnishes the body, ranking with round and sirloin steak in these constituents, so it may well take its place on the hearty dinner menu. Dr. Henry C. Sherman of Columbia university tells us also that "liver contains all three vitamins." "It is worth while," he continues, "to realize that the nutritive value of liver is higher than that of ordinary meats because of this vitamin content; and to see that liver is utilized fully as human food." Liver is a rich source of vitamin A, sometimes called the growth-promoting vitamin, and for that reason valuable in the diet of children. It is also a good source of vitamin B and a fair source of vitamin G, both of which aid in preventing certain diseases which develop if these vitamins are lacking in the diet. Recent experiments have also shown it to be one of the most valuable sources of iron in cases of anemia. So encourage a taste for liver and serve it fairly frequently. As it is usually accompanied by bacon and often by fried onions these somewhat pronounced flavors help to modify the characteristic liver flavor for those who would not like it otherwise.

No distinction in food value is made between the various kinds of liver—beef, calf, lamb or hog. Chicken liver is still higher in protein than the others.

Cook the bacon first, says the United States Department of Agriculture, allowing one or two thin slices for each person. Use a broad iron skillet and cook it over a slow fire, watching it to prevent scorching or uneven cooking. Take the pieces out and drain them the moment they are delicately browned and crisp. If you leave them in the fat they will be greasy. While the bacon is cooking, wipe the liver and slice moderately thin if you did not have the butcher do it. Many cooks pour boiling water over beef liver to draw out any blood remaining on it. The outer skin and veins may be removed if you wish. Hog and lamb livers are improved by scalding. Beef and calf livers are good either scalded or unscalded. Sprinkle each piece lightly with salt and, if you use it, a little pepper. Dip in flour and cook in the bacon fat as soon as the bacon is done. Keep the fire low and cook the liver slowly. A hot fire makes it dry and leathery and the edges often scorch. If the fat scorches it will not be good when you come to make your gravy. If you want fried onions with the liver they may be cooked at the same time. Cut the onions in thin round slices. When the liver is tender and golden brown, take it from the pan and keep it warm while you make the gravy. Strain the fat and then take two tablespoonfuls of it and mix with one and one-half tablespoonfuls of flour. There will be some flour already in the fat since the liver was floured. Use a cupful of milk to mix with the fat and flour and cook the gravy until smooth. Season with salt and pepper. If you prefer, pour the gravy over the liver, or serve it separately. Garnish the dish of liver with the bacon and perhaps a bit of parsley.

SPINACH QUICKLY COOKED IS FINE

Overcooking Injures Food Value of Green Food.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

When no one in the family seems to like spinach the trouble may be with the way you have cooked it. Perhaps you have overcooked your spinach until it lost its bright green color; pleasing texture, and fresh flavor. If cooked too long, spinach takes on a dark olive hue, develops a strong flavor, and becomes almost like pulp. People can hardly be blamed for not liking such spinach. Overcooking also injures the food value of spinach. The long boiling draws out the iron, calcium and other minerals, and destroys the vitamins. Try your family with spinach cooked for 10 to 15 minutes in just the water that clings to the leaves after you have washed it thoroughly. Then just as it begins to be tender, chop it very fine and season it with plenty of butter or, better still, cream. A hotel in Washington is becoming famous for its "special spinach" quickly cooked and combined with just enough cream to moisten it and give a rich flavor.

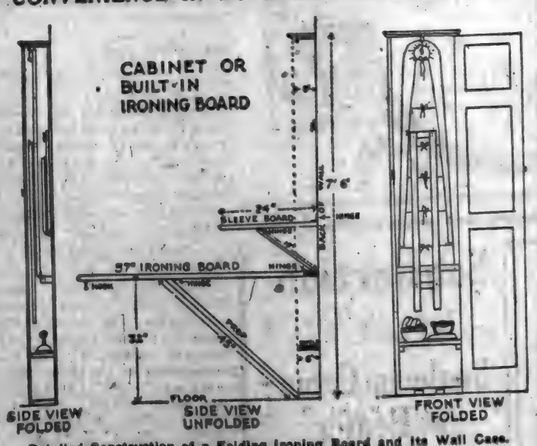
CONVENIENCE IN BUILT-IN IRONING BOARD



Detailed Construction of a Folding Ironing Board and Its Wall Case.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A built-in ironing board, hinged to the wall and supported with a hinged prop, is a great convenience in home laundering. The ironing board can then be folded up in a narrow closet with a shelf or two provided underneath it for storing the iron and other accessories. This keeps the board clean and the ironing equipment out of sight when not in use.

Construction of Cabinet.

The diagram, which is from the latest government publication on home laundering, Farmers' Bulletin 1497-F, shows how such a cabinet or closet for the built-in ironing board can be constructed. There is often a space available between two windows or a window and a door, too narrow for an ordinary cupboard or for a table or other kitchen equipment. Because of the light and cross current of air it would afford, this is an ideal place for the built-in ironing board. The source of heat for the iron should, of course, be conveniently near. The measurements given in the diagram suggest 32 inches as the height of the ironing board from the floor, but this distance should be changed according to the height of the person who is to do the ironing.

Adjusting Height.

Ironing boards with folding stands of many kinds may be bought. These should have an arrangement for adjusting the height to suit the worker. A firmly padded flat surface covered with clean white cloth is necessary for good results in ironing. If space permits, it is most convenient to have a table for sheets and other flat pieces, a board for skirts and such garments, and a sleeve board. If one board must serve all purposes, it should be fairly long and wide, with one narrow end.

For padding the ironing board or table the double-faced cotton flannel used for silence cloths on dining tables or an old blanket is good. Enough thickness of such material should be used to give the surface spring without making it cushiony. Old sheets may be used for the cover, but new unbleached sheeting is better and not expensive, as the width of the sheeting will make the length of the cover. The cover may be hemmed and four pieces of tape firmly sewed to each side so that it can be easily put on and taken off. Ready-made covers laced together through eyelets are also convenient. A sheet of asbestos placed under the iron rest and paper or cloth for cleaning the iron should protect the muslin cover from scorching. Some boards have a piece of tin or other sheet metal about 8 inches wide tacked across the end on which the iron is to stand.

Copies of Farmers' Bulletin 1497-F may be obtained free while the supply lasts by writing to the United States Department of Agriculture.

The price was moderate—too moderate, Caleb thought, rich with unspent salary and the possession of a thousand shares of Crystal Springs stock, preferred issue. Still, that was the artist's business, to price his own wares. While he waited for the group about the painter to dissolve, some one entered the gallery back of him and came swiftly up behind him with light steps. He turned to greet Mrs. Carquines, her face alight with welcome greeting, her jade eyes surveying him with their perpetual appraisal.

"This is fine!" she exclaimed. "Do you know, we have been talking about you all the afternoon? Or nearly all. I have lots of news for you," she added, the jade eyes full of promises.

"Carky has sold three pictures and we are going to celebrate," she went on. "We exist between sales, you know."

Caleb had a vision of a noisy studio gathering. He was not in the humor for such a celebration, not even for the news that the artist's wife suggested would be his reward.

"I'm afraid—" he commenced slowly. She broke in.

"There is nothing to be afraid of," she laughed. "It isn't that kind of a celebration. You and I and Carky will go back to the studio as soon as it is too dark to sell any more pictures. Carky won't exhibit under artificial light, you know. We shall bear with us luxuries, lychis, alligator pears, mushrooms, preserved ginger and other more substantial things. Carky will cook. I thought I could, before I married him, but I discovered my mistake. Therefore, on special occasions, Carky plays chef. You can stay all night or leave for your old gravel beds. We live across the bay, you know or you should know. Coming? You'll be sorry if you don't. There will be just—us." She emphasized the last word a trifle and stood looking at Caleb with her hands and arms a little extended in an invitation that was irresistible in its genuineness.

"I'll come," said Caleb, "if—"

"No ifs. You and I will go a-marketing. Come on."

"Not until I've bought this picture. I am going to take it along with me. It grips me, aside from the painting of it. What does 'La Tenaya' mean?"

"The Sink. As applied to a desert cistern, natural or otherwise," she answered. "It is in your line, isn't it? But I'm glad you chose it. It is my favorite and one of Carky's."

Presently Caleb and Mrs. Carquines did their marketing from the cab that Caleb chartered, through the markets and up Chinatown. Caleb bought some masses of iris for his share in the feast and then, on their way back to the studio, he halted the machine outside the most famous of Golden's stores, Le Blanc's.

"How old is the kiddy, Mrs. Carquines?" he asked. "You told me there was one, at Vedder's. A girl. How old?"

"She is not included in these celebrations, Mr. Warner. Please don't—"

"Please let me. Mrs. Carquines, I've been cooped up for months without blowing myself for a penny. This is my affair. You are not even to come in. I am going to choose it myself."

She laughed while Caleb entered and was whisked up to the floor consecrated to children's toys. He simplified matters and dodged his own ignorance by demanding the most elaborate doll on the floor. Mrs. Carquines said nothing much, affecting an air of disapproval, tempered by the look in her eyes, though she did exclaim at the size of the box.

"My child is only of ordinary dimensions, Mr. Warner. Have you tried to present her with a dancing partner of her own size?"

Caleb carried off his canvas triumphantly under his arm, despite Carquines' plea that it should be framed—at his expense, under his direction, in exchange for the present to his child.

The studio proper occupied all the level ground, a great room with the big north light at one end, a fireplace at the other. There was a fire in the hearth, glowing logs on andirons, more for charm than necessary heat. A settle with cushions that picked up the blacks and reds and white of a Navajo rug was empty. A big chair contained a slender figure in black holding a child.

Carquines had descended to his kitchen with the celebration plunder. Mrs. Carquines checked Caleb on the studio threshold while he took in the scene. The girl in black was crooning softly.

The child looked up and slid from the cuddly lap with a cry of—

"Madre! Auntie Betty, it's madre!" and came running to halt at the sight of Caleb—a slender elf with brown eyes big with astonishment and shyness and her mother's ash-gold hair entangling fire and lamplight. Behind her Betty Clinton got up and stood looking at Caleb.

The production of the marvelous doll broke all awkwardness of the [illegible] as the child, held out her rapture, Betty and Caleb shook hands.

"He is part of the celebration, Betty," said Mrs. Carquines. "We sold four canvases and he bought one of them. The best, 'La Tenaya.' Elsie, you haven't thanked Mr. Warner."

"I don't know how," said Elsie precociously. "You are a very nice gentleman to think of me. Did you bring a dolly for Aunt Betty's baby?"

Betty Clinton seemed a little confused and Mrs. Carquines laughed and changed the subject.

"Has she had her supper, Betty? Then it is bedtime." The child disappeared with Betty.

"She is Elsie's second mother, you see. I told you there would be just 'us,'" said the artist's wife. "Now, then, you and I will transform ourselves into kitchen assistants."

It was a wonderful dinner, served on the studio table. Afterward Mrs. Carquines sat down to a piano that lurked in a shadowy corner and played snatches of Chopin, giving place to the husband, who produced a guitar and sang "La Paloma."

"His enthusiasm is greater than his musical quality," laughed his wife, "but this is our celebration chant."

And then she went back into the house and, after a little, called Carquines, leaving the two alone.

"I am glad you came," said Betty. "I have something to say to you. An apology. I tried to write it, but that seemed cowardly. Now I have got my opportunity."

"Mary Morgan came to me," she went on. "She is in Sacramento with an irrigation concern and doing very well. She could not well take the child with her at first and so—she brought it with her when she visited me—Maria is playing foster mother. It is too young for dolls, though.

"You can guess why Mary Morgan came to El Nido. She told me all that you had done for her, and Mr. Cox, and she told me all of the miserable business between her and Baxter, together with how he had misrepresented you and deceived my father. I am sorry. I did doubt much of what he said, but it seemed quite convincing to my father. I am sorry you could not tell dad before he went. Will you forgive me?"

"There is nothing to forgive." The gladness in Caleb's voice backed his assertion. "Yet I should like to make one condition—no not a condition," he added, "a favor. If," he hesitated, thinking of her black gown, "if you are not averse to going out, I should like very much to have you come with Carquines and his wife to the opening of the Caliente works next month."

"I shall be very glad to come. I shall be out of mourning. Dad does not want me to be a recluse. Will that seal our forgiveness?"

She got up, slim in the twilight, and held out her hand. She had spoken in the present tense of her father. Caleb noticed, as if death had not severed the link between them.

"I also am very glad," he said, as he released her fingers.

He set up the unframed canvas that night in his room in the little bungalow set up for his use on the works, and it was the last thing his eyes rested upon before he turned in. Somehow it seemed to epitomize his career—water and desert places. He fancied Betty and himself in such a solitude, preparing the way for the fertility and population that should follow their discovery and development of water. And Betty did not appear entirely as co-worker. He had seen something of the softer side of her that came as a revelation that warmed and thrilled him to the core.

Nor did he forget to acknowledge Mary Morgan's share in all this, giving himself no credit for her straightening out matters with Betty Clinton. It was a reflex feeling from Cox's magnanimity that had sent Mary Morgan to Betty Clinton more than any desire to show up Baxter. So Caleb fancied, and was grateful. Mrs. Carquines was another one to come in for an unuttered blessing. The world began to go very well.

CHAPTER XVI

The Opening

There was no doubt, from the very beginning, of the success of the formal opening of the works. The day was perfect and the guests arrived by special train or motor to accord with a program laid out by Cox's secretary, who was a wizard for schedules.

Caleb had secured seats for Betty Clinton and Mr. and Mrs. Carquines, with whom she arrived, at the side of the table opposite the speakers. He had personally conducted them on the inspection tour and he saw them in their places before he went on to his own.

A table had been set for the foremen and their wives. Maria and Padilla had been sent invitations and they sat with this group, subordinate yet a part of the celebration. Beside Padilla was Evans, the water-diviner, now in general charge of the diverting ponds that extended above the lengths of the filter galleries.

While Caleb had greeted these humbler but necessary workers, one of the foremen rose as Betty, with the artist and his wife, was chatting with Evans, to whom she had been introduced at her own request.

"I had to fire that chap, Johnson, yesterday, Mr. Warner," said the man in a low tone. "He showed up drunk and he had a flask of some rotgut in his pocket. He was hanging around this morning and I warned him off. Acted dopey, to me."

"Quite right, Hardy."

It was curious, Caleb thought, that Baxter, if it was Baxter, should have come in at the end of the project he had tried to ruin as an involuntary witness to Caleb's triumph. He had little sympathy left for Baxter, no regret at the end of so one-sided a friendship. The way of the transgressor had to be hard and Baxter had strayed too far and too often beyond the pale not to deserve punishment. The thought of him did not accord with the spirit of the day and he dismissed it with the fact of his discharge.

The guests consisted of the heads of works, visiting engineers, some of whom had come a long way in professional interest, a selected list of stockholders, civic representatives from Oakville — the all-important press, including Vedder, and such wives and relatives of the fairer sex as considered the event worth their presence.

Cox presided and introduced the speakers. When it came to Caleb's turn a storm of applause greeted his rising, somewhat to his embarrassment. He managed a few phrases, accrediting Cox and the company with much of the meed of praise, paying more easily a glowing tribute to Hinckley, who was to follow him, neatly transferring his own burden of diffidence to the engineer. As he bowed to the renewed plaudits that came with the close of his little speech he looked across to where Betty Clinton sat at the extreme end of the opposite benches. Her hands added to the tribute, her face was aglow with enthusiasm.

Theatrical Offering Not Highly Popular

"The Beggar's Opera" was the first musical play presented on the American stage. It was written by John Gay, and was produced at the Nassau Street theater, New York, 174 years ago, January 14, 1751. A large proportion of the 10,000 people then comprising the population of New York attended the performance, although there were not a few who protested against "the godless affair" and threatened "to have the law" on it. The Murray and Keene company, a band of comedians who came to New York from Philadelphia, were responsible for the production, which was a benefit performance for Thomas Keene, who personally called on the leading citizens and sold tickets. The performance began at 6 o'clock and was over at 8:45. One of the lines from this light opera was "How happy could I be with either, were t'other dear charmer away."—Chicago Journal.

The Wreck

Pierre had been the sole witness of a wreck on one of the spur branches of a Canadian railway. He was asked by the attorney to take the witness stand and tell the story in his own way. To wit:

"Wal, sar, numbaire 2 she came down track lak she were all bended for 'lection—numbaire 8 she came same track other way an—bdomp—both smash op all over. By gar, I t'ink dat's wan h—l of a way to run a railroad."

Most of us are wonderful economists when it comes to making a little goodness go a long way. We hate to waste it or show it where it will not be appreciated.

THANKSGIVING DISHES

Pie is always in season but it is especially popular at the Thanksgiving table. Then there is the turkey which some one has said should be our national bird, instead of the eagle; potatoes Irish and sweet, squash, turnips, a fruit salad and then comes the great American dessert. Mince pie is the one par excellence to serve on Thanksgiving, and pumpkin pie holds a large place.

In the old days of brick ovens the mince pies were made by the dozen and then stored in a cold place in tiers where they could be called upon for any meal. Handy dessert it was—just place it in the oven and a savory, spicy pie was ready to serve.

As every family has some cherished recipe for preparing mince meat, it is useless to give the ingredients—chopped apple with meat and suet, using one of meat in measure to two of good tart apple, chopped. The meat of course is cooked, the suet, not; all the cooking it gets is in the cooking of the mince meat and in the baking of the pies. Cider, spices, dried fruits of all kinds, such as raisins, citrons, figs, lemon peel, orange peel, all add to its flavor.

Cranberry pie is another good one for the cold winter days, and tarts are especially well liked. Bake the crust over fluted patty tins and fill with stewed and sweetened cranberries.

For those who do not care for the meat in mince pies the following meatless one will be enjoyed:

Meatless Mince Meat.—Roll fine six large crackers and mix them with two cupfuls of sugar and one cupful of molasses, two cupfuls of cider or grape juice or one cupful of each, the juice of one orange and lemon, two cupfuls of seeded raisins, one-fourth cupful of shaved and chopped candied peel, half a cupful of melted butter, one-half teaspoonful each of ground cinnamon, cloves and nutmeg and three well-beaten eggs. This makes two large pies.

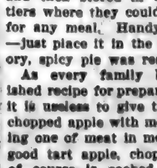
Lemon pie is another well known and liked pie, as well as apple and custard.

Cranberry Conserve.—Take one quart of cranberries, juice and pulp of two oranges, one cupful each of raisins and water, cook together until the cranberries burst and the mixture becomes soft. Add one cupful each of sugar and corn sirup and simmer until thick.

Molasses Pie.—Line a pie plate with a good rich crust and pour in the following mixture: Bring to boiling a cupful of molasses and add carefully a tablespoonful each of butter and flour rubbed together, and the juice of one large lemon and a pinch of cinnamon—if desired a half cupful of walnut meats. Cover with crust and bake.

Economy in Food.

There are still numbers of women who think that the meat which has been used to prepare soup, because it lacks flavor, is not good for food. The fact is that all the goodness is still there except the extractives which give it its flavor. Adding other flavors, such meats make substantial, appetizing and tasty dishes.



A little meat put through the meat grinder, added to buttered crumbs, a little onion softening with cream or tomato, used as stuffing for green peppers, is especially good; also made into hash with vegetables for flavor, croquettes and scalloped dishes. Such meat is very good baked with macaroni or spaghetti. For a curry dish, fry a little onion, add the meat, curry, vinegar—just a bit—and serve with a border of cooked seasoned rice. To use a variety of flavorings such as sweet herbs, and meat sauces, one may have variety with little expense.

A casserole with a tight cover is an invaluable aid for economy in the house.

Cheaper cuts of meat with long, slow cooking are made most attractive. The long, slow cooking develops flavor and makes it more digestible.

Such seasonings as kitchen bouquet, soy sauce, worcestershire sauce, tabasco sauce, pepper sauce, celery salt, mace, mint, garlic are all such good aids to make appetizing otherwise unsavory foods.

Original "Hussars"

The word hussar was first applied to the light cavalry troops raised by Matthias Corvinus in 1458 to fight against the Turks. The word was derived from a Magyar word "huss," meaning 20, the method of selection being every twentieth man in the community. The term hussar was adopted by a regiment of British cavalry in 1805 and has since then been applied to certain bodies of light cavalry in many countries.—New York Herald Tribune.

Lesson for November 14

CALEB'S FAITHFULNESS REWARDED

LESSON TEXT—Josh. 14:6-14.

GOLDEN TEXT—I wholly followed the Lord my God.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Brave Spy Rewarded.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Reward of Service.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Caleb, the Courageous.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Blessings That Follow Wholehearted Obedience.

I. Elements of Caleb's Character.

1. Independence of spirit (Num. 13:30).

Though the multitude clamored to follow the report of the ten, Caleb determined to stand alone. This is an element in human character which is highly important. One should stand for what he knows to be right, regardless of the sentiment of the crowd.

2. True to convictions (Josh. 14:6, cf. Num. 14:6-9).

What Caleb knew and felt he spoke out. He did not wait for the opinion of others and then modify his to suit the populace. A true man and one who can be trusted will be loyal to his convictions.

3. Unselfish (14:12).

He did not ask for some easy place. He did not wish to thrust someone else into the place of difficulty. He wanted to go into the place where it would require fighting in order to drive out the giants which were in the land.

4. Courageous (Josh. 14:12, cf. 13:30).

This courage he displayed when he insisted that they were able to go up from Kadesh-Barnea and take possession of the land. Forty-five years have elapsed since that time. He would be considered an old man now, but still he desired that place for an inheritance which would require some fighting. He said, "I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me, as my strength was then, even so is my strength now for war."

II. Caleb Laying Claim to His Inheritance (vv. 6-12).

Caleb did not come alone to make his claim. He came in the presence of the children of Judah, lest he be suspicioned of taking advantage. He did not wish to wait until after the lot was cast, for God had already given a certain portion to him. It were useless to ask God to decide a matter which He had already determined. The basis of his plea was:

1. The ground of his service (vv. 6-8).

He had endangered his life in spying out the land—had gone to Hebron when the giants were there. He brought back a true report when his brethren were all against him. He bore his testimony and insisted that they go up and take the land though to do so incurred the displeasure of his brethren and necessitated his standing practically alone.

2. On the ground of the oath of Moses to him (v. 9).

Joshua had respect for Moses, and was bound to follow the counsels of his faithful master whom he had succeeded. This plea was effective.

3. On the ground of God's providential dealing with him (vv. 10-12).

God had preserved him in bodily health. Though he was now eighty-five years old, his natural forces were not abated. He said, "I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me, as my strength was then even so is my strength now for war."

III. Joshua Giving the Inheritance to Caleb (13:14, 15).

1. Joshua blessed Caleb (v. 13).

He not only acquiesced in Caleb's claim, but bestowed the blessing of God upon him in it.

2. The inheritance given (vv. 13, 14).

Hebron was the name of the inheritance. The name Hebron means fellowship. It was given because Caleb had fully followed the Lord. Only those who fully follow the Lord can enjoy fellowship with Him. Though Caleb now legally possessed Hebron, it was necessary for him to fight to drive out the giants who infested it. In Christ we have an inheritance which God has given us. We, too, must fight because the enemy is unwilling to relinquish his claim upon it.

Believing in Christ

Many men do not believe in Christ because they do not want to do what Christ demands of them. Their doubts are not intellectual, as they pretend, but practical. They deny Christ so as to escape obligation and effort.—Young People.

To Livestock Owners

If You Own Any Horses, Cattle, Poultry or Hogs, by All Means Read This.

Safeguard your stock against the costly ravages of quick-spreading disease. Nature has provided wonderful health-giving roots and herbs which have proved unfailing in thousands of cases. These are combined in a time-tried, reliable remedy, Porter's Pain King—the standby of hundreds of farmers in this community. They recommend it highly for sores, colds and distemper in horses and for soreness of the udder, caked teats, and bloat in cows.

Every day chickens are becoming better money-earners, and there is an increasing use of Porter's Pain King by careful poultry raisers everywhere. It is a positive relief for gapes, roup and parasitic growths. Sick hens are not good layers.

Use Porter's Pain King at the slightest sign of trouble. Just follow the directions with each bottle. It may save you several hundred dollars. Your dealer guarantees satisfaction or money back. Made and guaranteed by The Geo. H. Rundle Co., Piqua, Ohio, since 1871.

Women, Don't Suffer!

Kokomo, Ind.—"I was suffering with all kinds of aches and pains—head, back and side, dizzy spells and nervousness. The doctors tried to help me and I tried all kinds of remedies but got little relief. I was advised to try Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. I hesitated on account of the failure of other treatments, but at last I tried it. One bottle helped me so much I got two more, and by the time I had taken them I was feeling like a different woman. It had relieved me of all aches and pains and made me well."—Mrs. Roy Griffey, 1225 W. Taylor St. All dealers.

Today is Always Best

by O. Lawrence Hawthorne

Twas only yesterday, it seems,
That I was just a little boy
And life was filled with idle dreams
And play. Oh, how I did enjoy
Those happy hours, too quickly sped
Into the past! Soon I shall see
That busy, hopeful youth has fled,
And never can return to me.

Then age will come. 'Tis but a day
Until my final sun will set.
But I shall go with spirit gay
And heart that harbors no regret.
If I live manfully and face
Each golden morning with a smile—
If I determine to embrace
The chance to make today worth while.

LIFE OF MARY E. COOK WHO PASSED AWAY FROM CANCER

Mary E. Cook, daughter of Wm. H. and Olive Fields, was born in Spencer township, DeKalb county, Indiana, Nov. 17, 1861. She was an only daughter but had four brothers, George, Charles, William and Simon, all of whom are dead.

She was united in marriage Nov. 16, 1885, to Jerome Cook, who died eleven years ago. To this union were born eleven children two of whom are dead. Those surviving are, Homer of Hicksville, O., Nora Norrick of Butler, Jessie Barger of Fayette, Ohio, Grace Walter of Ft. Wayne, John, Melvin, Frank and Milford, living at home, and Charles, at whose home she died in DeKalb county.

She was a hard working woman and when bereft of her husband she not only cared for her large family but three of her grandchildren.

She passed away Sunday, Oct. 31, 1926, after months of suffering from cancer having expressed her readiness and eagerness to meet her Master.

Improved Snow Plow Keeps Railroad Open

The snow problem on the world's northernmost electric railroad, which crosses the Swedish peninsula almost entirely north of the Arctic circle, has now been solved by the introduction of two rotating electric snowplows, whose whirling steel knives cut through any drift that may pile up on the tracks overnight. Built chiefly to carry the Lapland ores to the sea coasts of either Sweden or Norway, the line runs most of the way through a semi-arctic desert, where not only snowstorms are violent, but where shoveling crews are hard to recruit, the region being practically uninhabited, except by Lapps and their reindeer herds. Last year the winter was particularly hard and freight trains loaded with iron ore got stuck in snowdrifts near the Swedish-Norwegian border as early as October. Since the arrival of the special snow plows, however, the route has been kept clean.

NEWS OF THE TOWN

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Meese were at Fort Wayne, Monday.

You can get transfer paper at News office in large or small sheets.

C. C. Woodcox is in Detroit this week on business connected with the Chrysler Corporation.

George Milliman, of Michigan, was in town on business Wednesday. Mrs. Milliman has been in Fort Wayne for several weeks and George went to that place from here expecting to remain there indefinitely. He reports the dry weather in Michigan hurt their early crops and then the rains this fall damaged the later crops.

John Orr, of Wabash, motorman on a freight interurban car of the Indiana Service corporation, was the victim of a peculiar accident a mile east of Boyd Park, Monday. His car ran into a covey of quail most of which were resting on the track, and one of the birds crashed so hard against the front glass of the car that it was shattered and Orr's two front teeth were knocked out. His face was also badly cut. Orr continued as far as Logansport, where he was relieved of his duties and given medical attention.

LARGE INGATHERING FOR AUBURN CHURCH

The First Methodist church of Auburn recorded one of the greatest days in its recent history Sunday. All th services were largely attended. The Sunday School had present 424. At the morning service the rite of baptism was administered upon twenty-six candidates, thirty-four were received into church fellowship upon confession of faith and nineteen by letter, making a total of fifty-three at this service. Four more were received by letter at the evening service.

KIDDIES ENJOY BIRTHDAY PARTY

Master Dickie Jordan celebrated his fifth birthday anniversary Friday afternoon when several of his little friends were invited in to enjoy the afternoon with him. The little folks played games and each were given a lollypop for a souevnir. One pleasing fenture to the children was the birthday cake lighted with five candles and served with fruit salad. Those enjoying the occasion were Carma Jean Wilcox, Eloise Coburn, Donna Brodbeck, Cathrine Belle Curie, Delmar Hickman, Dean Thomas, Billy Woodcox and Junior Curie.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CLASS PARTY

Mrs. Pauline Jordan entertained the Friendly Bible Class of the M. P. Sunday School Monday evening in a very pleasing manner. A splendid program had been prepared and the evening spent together was a profitable and pleasant one. The class has been invited to meet at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Benninghoff at Fort Wayne for their December meeting. Mr. and Mrs. Clayton Wyatt of Fort Wayne, were guests.

CHICKEN POX EPIDEMIC

The first general sickness for the school term is now on among the children. Harry Randall, Jean Ridgway, Wayne Donley and Leonard Curie are among the kiddies sick with chicken pox. Some are convalescing while others are just coming down.

A. Z. Arehart, for several years DeKalb county agriculture agent has resigned a similar position with Porter county at Valparaiso to take effect December 1 in order to succeed Dr. John Baur as business manager of Valparaiso university. Dr. Baur will be financial secretary and in chage of the endowment. Mr. Arehart will also have charge of the university farm.

POULTRY FACTS

PULLETS VERSUS HENS FOR EGGS

It is commonly believed that well-matured pullets will produce more eggs than hens a year older. How much more has been studied by the Maine department station. The results of this study add strength to the emphasis on pullets as egg producers.

The records covering several years and a considerable number of flocks show that pullets produced about 40 per cent more eggs than they did in their second year of laying. Not only was the production larger but the greater per cent were laid during the period of high prices. That is, properly handled, matured pullets will produce more of the eggs during the winter months the first year than they will the second year of egg production.

Another factor in favor of keeping as high a per cent as possible of pullet producers in the egg factory is the higher death rate that comes with each added year of age. Aside from contagious diseases that are no respecters of age, the deaths among mature birds mount rapidly after the first year; more rapidly among the American breeds than the Mediterranean, probably.

These three reasons should boost close culling of the farm flock during the summer and fall. Keeping any hen after the close of the second laying year is generally poor policy unless she is of proved value as a member of the breeding pen.

Conditions on most farms favor the disposal of a high per cent of the hens in order to give the pullets adequate room for development. More pullets and hens kept than the houses and facilities warrant are ten times more frequent than a small flock that the housing and equipment justifies.

Mash Feed Is Important for Production of Eggs

"A large mash consumption is necessary for the maximum number of eggs," says R. E. Cray, extension specialist in poultry at the Ohio State university. Therefore, it will pay to induce the hens to eat as much mash as possible. One suggestion that Mr. Cray makes is that the grain be fed only in the evening, which will cause the hens to eat more of the mash than they otherwise would.

Plenty of space at the mash hoppers is also recommended as another means of bringing about larger consumption of mash. Timid hens will be crowded away if the space around the hoppers is small. One foot of hopper space is suggested for every five hens.

If the mash is moistened with milk occasionally, the hens will appreciate the variety and will eat large quantities.

Late Molters Best Layers

In culling a flock, it is first necessary that something be known about the kind and regularity of the feed, the housing conditions and the care the birds have received. It is well known that improper feed, housing or care can easily throw a flock into an early molt. The time that a hen goes through her molt will be a good indication of her ability as an egg producer. Those that molt late in the fall are usually the best layers.

Poultry Hints

Dirty eggs cost the farmers millions of dollars a year.

Turkeys of good breeding—that is, pure-bred stock—are always in good demand for breeding.

Even when ducks and geese have a sand run it is well to put about 1 per cent in the mash once aday.

• • •

Do not keep longer the old hens which have ceased to lay and have gone into a molt. With very few exceptions, they are not high producers.

The late hatched chicks neither add to your average egg production nor increase the vitality of the flock.

For profitable and effective poultry production the feeder should never fill the trough with more feed than will be consumed before the next feeding period.

Ground cheese and wheat screenings is heavy feed, and care must be taken not to feed too much of it. Pound for pound, it will take the place of most other grains.

In order to succeed with turkeys it is necessary to start with strong, vigorous birds.

The best turkeys for breeding are those two years old or older, as a turkey is never at her best until that age.

• • •

For a flock that is kept penned up, this is an excellent egg-making feed to give two or three times a week: chopped or ground alfalfa steamed until soft, and mixed with cornmeal, wheat middlings and bran.

CENSUS REVEALS ASTONISHING FACT

8,549,511 Working Women in United States

MRS. W. M. BAILEY

Many Say Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Helps Keep Them Fit to Work

8,549,511 women would be a vast army. According to the 1920 Census of Manufactures, that is the number of women and girls employed in all trades in the United States.

Napoleon said, "An army travels on its stomach." This army of women travels on its general health. Every working girl knows that time lost through illness seldom is paid for and seldom can be made up. Employers demand regularity. If she wants to keep her job or hopes for a better one, she must guard her health.

Atlanta, Ga.—"My system was weak and run-down, and I was tired. I was this way for five years or more. I read your advertisement in the papers and I decided to try your medicine, the Vegetable Compound, but I did not begin to take it regularly until after I was married. I got so much good from it that I feel fine and have gained in weight. I work in a broom shop, but my work is not so hard on me now, and I keep my own house, and work my garden, too. I am telling all my friends of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and how it has helped me."—Mrs. W. M. Bailey, R. F. D. No. 5, Box 27, Atlanta, Georgia.

Missouri Woman Helped

Parkville, Mo.—"I am proud to recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I was so ill that I could not lie down at night. Then I got my husband to go to the store and buy me a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I was up and around before the first bottle was gone, although I only weighed about ninety pounds. I took six or eight bottles and was able to do all my housework, washing and ironing, take care of my five boys, and tend to my chickens and garden, where before I had to hire my washing and part of my housework."—Mrs. Anna Cole, R. Keep Fit!

Good Health Requires Good Elimination.

TO be well, you must keep the blood stream free from impurities. If the kidneys lag, allowing body poisons to accumulate, a toxic condition is created. One is apt to feel dull, languid, tired and achy. A nagging backache is sometimes a symptom, with drowsy headaches and dizzy spells. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. If you have reason to suspect improper kidney functioning, try Doan's Pills — a tested stimulant diuretic. Users praise them throughout the United States. Ask your neighbor!

OSTRICH-TRIMMED HATS POPULAR; BLOUSE EFFECTS IN NEGLIGEES

A FAR cry it is from the smartly simple little felt hats which initiated the autumn season to the ostrich-trimmed hats which the star of fashion's destiny foretells for the future. When, however, one takes into consideration that the trend of modern dress is more and more toward the ornate—a more feminised styling as the mode puts it—it becomes easy to account for the awakening interest in ostrich. Not only in the field of millinery, but throughout the costume an enthusiasm for ostrich is evident.

The vogue for ostrich, instead of starting within the realm of millinery as is usual, began otherwise, in that evening dresses and wraps for some time have been ostrich trimmed. Just now the favor for ostrich accessories such as fans, boas and shoulder motifs is very pronounced.

That ostrich is and ever will be a charming trimming for the chapeau is told in this picture of hats selected from the leading atelier of the world. We see in this group in the lower left corner a high soft-top model in black hatter's plush. A black and white chinchilla ostrich pompon trims this model. With it milady wears a two-yard boa to match.

The large picture hat above to the right is of claret-red velvet entirely swathed in shaded ostrich plumage over ribbon. The side trim is of silvered hackle combined with ostrich.

More than for many seasons past elaborateness is the keynote of woman's attire. In the intimate negligee and boudoir robe wealth of color and enrichment of design find their happiest expression. Thus modern woman elects to enrobe herself quite gorgeously within the environs of her own home.

Just now in the evolving of the formal boudoir robe or teagown the tendency is to combine a striking print or brocade with a solid color. Red velvet with gold lace or metal brocade has become a favorite ensemble. These are modishly complemented in the newer negligees by using the novelty fabric for graceful huge sleeves. Unique sleeves, by the way, are an outstanding feature of elaborated house robes, such as the bat-wing and the picturesque flowing angel sleeve.

The bloused effect also has entered the domain of the negligee. A truly typical up-to-date model is shown in the accompanying picture. Handsome print silk is here combined with black satin. The former is bloused according to latest style dictates, with the solid black satin reserved for the wrap-around skirt portion.

Something new for the woman of fashion to dream about is the rhine stone-studded negligee. Of course this beauteous teagown must have long-flowing sleeves, and to be sure it must be fashioned of a diaphanous fabric, such as peach-colored georgette, for instance.

A Typical Up-to-Date Model.

In practical house robes the quilted ones are now the preferred kind. These are styled of crepe de chine, also changeable satins. Some are embroidered, some have ostrich or marabou trims. JULIA BOTTOMLEY.

displaying tones of brown and rose-petal. By the way, notice the showy shoulder bouquet. Instead of the simple single flower this fashion obtains.

Antelope felt is chosen for the little hat at the top of this collection. It is violet color edged with matching grosgrain ribbon, with metallised ostrich tips showing glints of crayon colorings grouped flat about the crown.

The last hat here illustrated claims style and beauty in that it is of bluet-dyed antelope felt with banding of silver ribbon.

If Kidneys Act Bad Take Salts

Says Backache Often Means You Have Not Been Drinking Enough Water

When you wake up with backache and dull misery in the kidney region it may mean that you have been eating foods which create acids, says a well-known authority. An excess of such acids overworks the kidneys in their effort to filter it from the blood and they become sort of paralyzed and loggy. When your kidneys get sluggish and clog you must relieve them, like you relieve your bowels, removing all the body's urinous waste, else you have backache, sick headache, dizzy spells; your stomach sours, tongue is coated and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine is cloudy, full of sediment, channels often get sore, water scalds and you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night.

Either consult a good, reliable physician at once or get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate sluggish kidneys, also to neutralize acids in the system, so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful, effervescent lithia-water drink. Drink lots of soft water.

GARRETT EXPRESS AGENT ARRESTED

Harry Ray Admits He Stole To Provide Amusements For His Wife

Harry Ray, night agent for the American Railway Express Co. in Garrett, was placed under arrest Thursday night after he confessed to the theft of a large amount of merchandise. He was lodged in the county jail.

Ray is married and lives a mile north and a quarter of a mile west of Garrett. He has held the position of night agent since last March. Recently C. J. DuPont, agent of the company, received a tip that Ray was stealing from through express shipments and he and Grover C. Sapp, lieutenant of Baltimore and Ohio police, instituted an investigation.

Ray finally confessed Thursday night that he stole a radio worth $110, but denied any other thefts. Lieut. Sapp and Mr. DuPont asked him if he had any objection to their searching his house and he assured them he had none. Going from the cellar through the house, they found about 200 articles that had been stolen, with a value of $400 to $500. It was learned, also, that Ray had taken a $75 shotgun and had left it with Ford Shields, a farmer near Helmer, as surety for payment for a beagle hound. The gun was recovered.

Among the merchandise also were a die outfit worth $25, 1,000 gauge shotgun shells and four pounds of 22 calibre rifle shells. Ray claimed he commenced stealing in order to provide his wife with amusements. A charge of grand larceny was placed against him in the DeKalb circuit court Friday afternoon.

When taken before Judge Endicott, Ray entered a plea of guilty. He gave his age as twenty-six years. He said he was married to Anna Krick four months ago. The court thereupon pronounced a sentence of one to fourteen years in the penitentiary and a fine of $1 and costs and disfranchised the defendant for one year.

The affidavit signed by Lieut. Sapp, sets out that Ray not only stole the radio, shotgun, rifle shells and die set, but also sixteen cans of coffee, two jars of crushed pineapple, twelve cans of cherries, 500 twelve guage shotgun shells, eight packages of butter, nine pairs of canvas gloves, one vise and fittings, three radio tubes, one hydrometer, three packages of mica, one aerial, eight pencil sharpeners, thirty-five pounds of 12 guage shotgun shells, a pair of boots, a bumper strip, a level, two handsaws, three radio batteries, a radio horn, an eight-foot rule, a punch drill, a ratchet screw driver, three claw hammers, six wood chisels, a brace, six bits, a panel saw blade, a cord tire, a hunting coat, a pair of woolen blankets, two comforters and a winter enclosure for an automobile.

FINE IMPROVEMENT IN HAMBURG ADDITION

Roy Kinsey is working on the residence formerly owned by John Barger, on the north side of the tracks, but now owned by parties at Edgerton. The inside is being painted and papered completely, the outside is being painted two coats, the wall repaired and everything put in first class condition. This is a fine improvement for this part of town.

SURPRISE BIRTHDAY DINNER

The birthday anniversary of Mrs. Isaac Meese was celebrated Sunday at her home. Before noon Mr. and Mrs. Cal Hutton and family arrived with baskets full of eats and surprised Mrs. Meese. Other guests were Mr. and Mrs. Glen Hefley and son who remained until Wednesday evening, and Melba Hutton and friend, Ivan Rhodes.

FROM OUR FILES OF MARCH 8, 1900

The following personals are taken from The News of 26 years ago. The paper was edited by M. E. Olds:

Uncle Jim Abel has been quite sick the past two days.

Miss Mattie Tustison has been on the sick list for several days.

Miss Lina Sheffer, who teaches in Butler township, was at home over Sunday.

The population of St. Joe is increasing, several families having moved into town recently.

Someone has said that he who is looking for a soft place without hard labor will generally find it under his hat.

Mrs. John Hull returned from Elkhart last week. She left her sister who has been quite sick, much improved.

Mrs. Sam Warner has been at Chicago several days visiting her daughter and selecting a stock of spring millinery.

Will Everett has been home from Elkhart for a few days visiting his family. They will move to that city in the spring.

Word comes from Elkhart that Mr. and Mrs. Clint Reasoner are rejoicing over the arrival of a new girl baby at their home.

We understand that John Tustison will take charge of the photo gallery at this place again, and intends to add several new improvements to the outfit so that he will be able to do the latest up-to-date work.

The printer got us mixed up on two church announcements last week and we came very near getting in serious trouble. We were enabled finally to explain matters so that everything was fixed up all right.

We are pleased to know that our friend, Jerry Klopfenstein of near Leo received the nomination for trustee of Cedar township, at the convention held on Saturday. Jerry is all right and will no doubt be the next trustee.

From this date on Courtland R. Price will be at Dr. Bowman's office in St. Joe on Thursday and Friday and until noon on Saturday of each week for the practice of dentistry. All work guaranteed and prices reasonable.

St. Joe is having a healthy boom and in addition to a new factory, is to have a new brick block 44x70 feet, two stories, the first for stores and the second for an opera house. If Waterloo doesn't get a move on, it will soon find St. Joe in the lead in county towns. —Waterloo Press.

While at Garrett last week, M. T. Bishop had an interview with Mr. Spielman of the B. & O., and he said there would b no trouble in getting the company to move the depot at this place up to the vacant lot at the 3rd. stree crossing. Accordingly a petition, signed by the business men of the town has been sent in asking for the change. J. D. Leighty offers to donate the company the sight, and the town will move the depot up free of charge.

SEEK PADLOCK ORDER FOR GARRETT STORE

Padlock proceedings were instituted in the DeKalb circuit court by H. C. Springer, prosecuting attorney, against Emery Swanders, of Garrett, who runs a second hand store. The complaint sets out that intoxicating liquors were and are being sold and given away in the building and that persons have been permitted to resort there for the purpose of drinking. It is set out that Swanders was convicted in the city court, of Garrett, on a charge of operating a nuisance.

The complaint says that Swanders sold a revolver without a permit and that he permitted poker games to be operated on the second floor. The court is asked to make an order enjoining the maintenance of the nuisance and closing the building for a year, prohibiting the owner from going upon the real estate or entering it during that period without an order from the court.

STATE OBJECTS TO AMOUNT AWARDED

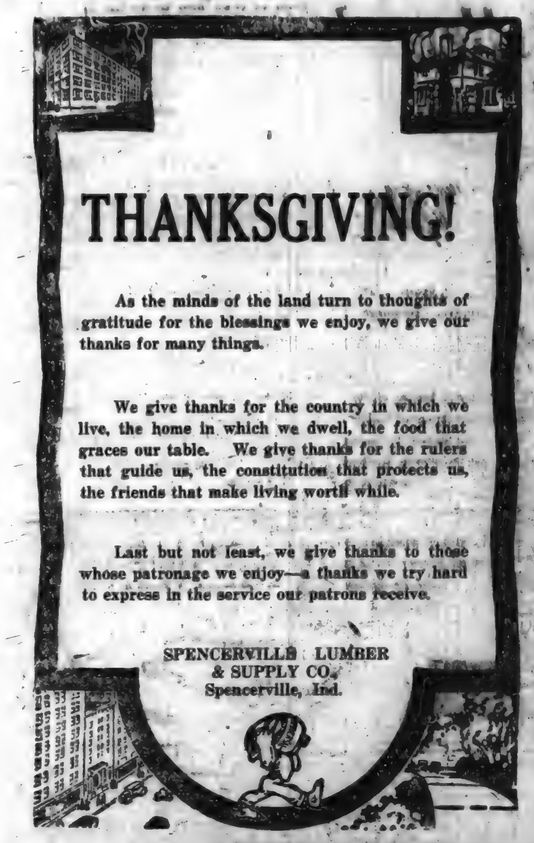
Thinks That Damages For DeKalb County Farmers, East Of Waterloo, Excessive

Judge Arthur F. Biggs of Ligonier, sitting in the DeKalb circuit court Monday, heard arguments on a motion filed by the attorney general of Indiana in the condemnation proceedings against Ora E. Bohler and Mrs. Rosella Smurr.

The state hopes to have impounded the money awarded Mr. Bohler and Mrs. Smurr for the land they own lying between Waterloo and Butler that is wanted for the new paved highway. The highway commission contends that $1,566.75 for the Smurr land and $1,475 for the Bohler land is excessive and has appealed from the awards of the appraisers. Jury trial before Judge Biggs will probably be held in January, unless a change of venue from the county is taken. The highway commission can under the law secure possession of the land by paying the amounts of the awards into the office of the clerk of the court. The commission asks the court to order the clerk to hold this money in his possession until the jury makes its awards, on the theory that the awards by the jury may be less than those of the appraisers appointed by the court, who were F. E. Rhodes, Frank Baltz and Philip Habig.

The state was represented at the hearing on the motion by Capt. H. C. Springer, who has been assisting the attorney general in these cases. Edgar W. Atkinson was present for Mrs. Smurr and Mr. Bohler and resisted the motion. Capt. Springer argued that it was within the discretion of the court to make such an order, but Mr. Atkinson contended that the court had no authority in the matter.

Judg Biggs withheld his decision, but indicated that he ould overrule the moton.



THANKSGIVING!

As the minds of the land turn to thoughts of gratitude for the blessings we enjoy, we give our thanks for many things.

We give thanks for the country in which we live, the home in which we dwell, the food that graces our table. We give thanks for the rulers that guide us, the constitution that protects us, the friends that make living worth while.

Last but not least, we give thanks to those whose patronage we enjoy—a thanks we try hard to express in the service our patrons receive.

WHY WE CELEBRATE THANKSGIVING

Today, the people of these United States, in observance with a custom, which began on the bleak shores of New England's rock-bound unhospitable coast, meet to render praise and thanks to Almighty God for the many and maniofld blessings vouchsafed us as a nation.

The observance of this custom, is one peculiar to our country. When we take a retrospective view of past events, we are enabled to note changes, both physically and Spiritually, in our land, which we are pleased to think, the greatest, under God's own sunshine.

With that spirit of liberty whioh animated their breasts, the pilgrim fathers sought a haven of refuge from conditions intolerable; where one did not dare express a thought on a religious question, if such was not in harmony with those of the powers, which held the reins of government too tightly, lest they forfeit even life itself. With this high and noble purpose in view, they braved the terrors of the deep, perils of land and sea, rather than yield to a tyrannical desposism, which sought to hold control over soul as well as body.

It was under such conditions, that the fathers, who laid down the principles, which, ultimately were the ground-work of our Constitution, found themselves, after a hard winter, insufficient harvest, danger from savage Indians; gave us our first Thanksgiving day.

Harking back to those times, we note with varying emotions the transitions wrought by Father Time. The energy and perseverance of the people, have transformed sylvan forests and rolling prairie, into fertile farms and thriving cities, bands of steel knit every section most closely, the railraod, telegraph, telephone, radio have supplanted the ox cart, stage coach, courier on horse back. The mechanical appliances, too numerous to enumerate, exceed the wildest visions of a Jules Verne, or a Haggard. From doubters and plodders, our credulity is not overtasked at the mention of any new developement of a scientific or mechanical nature: and America has become a synonym for speed. All this has taken place, in a period of time, which sems as nothing when compared with the progress of older European nations.

What does it all mean? Does it bode good or evil? That will depend on us. If in our egotism and pride we forget God, take upon ourselves credit for it all; regard the material as all sufficient, we will fall as surely as did Babylon. That is the great danger. Will we see the handwriting? Will our footsteps be guided by the lamp of experience, which is best expressed in that beautiful poem by Lowell, in "The present Cricis," he writes—"Careless seems the great avenger; history's pages but record One death grapple in the darkness 'twixt old systms and the Word: Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne.—Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown, Standeth God within that shadow, keeping watch above His own."

Only a desire upon our part, to adhere in meekness, and humility of spirit, as actuated the pilgrim fathers, will hold this ship of state to its moorings.

If we do this none can pluck us from the Father's hand. —A.E.C.

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION

By Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States

As a nation and as individuals we have passed another twelve months in the favor of the Almighty. He has smiled upon our fields and they have brought forth plentiful; business has prospered; industries have flourished, and labor has been well employed. While sections of our country have been visited by disaster we have been spared any great national calamity or pestilential visitation. We are blessed among the nations of the earth.

Our moral and spiritual life has kept measure with our material prosperity. We are not unmindful of the gratitude we owe to God for his watchful care which has pointed out to us the ways of peace and happiness and we should not fail in our acknowledgement of His divine favor which has bestowed upon us so many blessings. Neither should we be forgetful of those among us who, through stress of circumstances, are less fortunately placed, but by deeds of charity make our acknowledgment more acceptable in His sight.

Wherefor, I, Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, do hereby set apart Thursday, the twenty-fifth day of November, as a day of general thanksgiving and prayer, and I recommend that on that day the people shall cease from their daily work, and in their homes or in their accustomed places of worship, devoutly give thanks to the Almighty for the many and great blessings they have received, and seek His guidance that through good deeds and brotherly love they may deserve a continuance of His favor.

THANKSGIVING

"Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness and for His wonderful works to the children of men!"—Ps. 107:31.

Thanksgiving day is unique in our calendar. It is both a national and a religious occasion. Thus, like no other day in the year, is reminiscent of those ancient times in the Holy Land of the Bible, when feasts and festivals were expressions at once of devotion to God and love of country. It is the one religious day which can be and is celebrated by three major faiths of our diversified population.

On Thursday, November 25, the observance of the national Thanksgiving festival should everywhere be marked by sincerity and fervor. The formal avowals of gratitude to the Most High should go forth from the hearts and not merely from the lips. "Words are but empty thanks" unless they bear true witness of the reverent and grateful spirit.

Thanksgiving day is clearly an American institution, rich in historic interest. The first Thanksgiving day was observed in 1621, about a year after the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, November 21, 1620.

When the first president of this republic, worn and fatigued from the field of revolution for liberty, called upon the people to observe a day of thankful consecration to the Giver of all blessings, he declared we should be grateful "for tranquility, union and plenty:"

No other nation has shared so abundantly in these three blessings.

Since 1863 the Presidents have always issued proclamations appointing the last Thursday in November as Thanksgiving day.

If our Pilgrim fathers felt impelled to institute Thanksgiving day in the midst of hardship, should not we, rejoicing in plenty and security, return thanks ten thousand fold?—Contributed.

BAKE SALE AND BAZAAR

A cordial invitation is extended to everybody to attend the Thanksgiving service at the Lutheran church, Thursday evening. A mixed program will be given to please both old and young. Come.

NEW STORE COMING TO ST. JOE

Walter W. Zonker has rented the west room in the Leighty block and will commence to move his stock of goods in this week. Mr. Zonker is moving his Roanoke stock here. On Saturday, this week, he will auction the part of the stock that he does not wish to move. Bills for this sale are being printed at this office.

The store will be in readiness before the Christmas trade is over and Mr. Zonker states that he expects to stock up completely with Dry Goods, Groceries, Rubber Goods, Shoes, so as to have an up-to-date store.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE DAY OBSERVANCE

The M. P. Church, through the efforts of their pastor Rev. J. F. McKnight, are planning on an all day meeting for next Sunday Sunday School at 9:30; preaching at 10:30; basket dinner at noon and followed by a program dealing with the work of Annual Conference and its budget as applied to the local church membership. Committees have been selected to care for every detail of the day's work and it is hoped that the membership responds to the activity.

Canadian Liquor Smuggled in Coal Is Nabbed

Prohibition agents at Spokane, Wash., found liquor was being smuggled across the Canadian border hidden in a car of coal, and after a pistol battle they caught three men and a woman and seized whisky valued at $10,000 and four automobiles. Above is shown some of the captured booze with the officers.

New Flag for the National Capitol

For the first time in history another flag flew from the same mast with the Stars and Stripes on the United States capitol building on Armistice day. It is a service flag donated by the Gold Star Mothers on which is written the number of American boys who failed to come back from "Over There." This photograph shows Mrs. H. H. McClure (right), national president of the American War Mothers, presenting to David Lynn, architect of the Capitol, this unusual flag.

LUCKIEST OF WOMEN

They say "she is the luckiest woman on earth," this Mrs. William Jones of Covington, Ky. She has won over $1,600 in contest money so far this year. She has been winning for three years past some two dozen or more contest prizes. Proverb contests, prize essays, guessing contests, all come easy for her. She is in every nationally advertised contest and spends two evenings each week working over her answers. Her latest annexation was a $500 prize for telling people why they should eat salmon, which was given by the National Salmon Packers' association.

TO WAR HEROES

This is the great shaft of the Liberty memorial in Kansas City before which President Coolidge delivered his Armistice day address. The President took part in the dedication of the memorial, which includes two museum buildings not shown in the photograph. The structure cost $1,500,000.

SELF-TRIMMED SATIN STYLISH; ENSEMBLE WITH COAT AND CAPE

THAT there are two sides to a question is literally proven by the new satins which are so smartly in fashion for the practical daytime frock. It is the luster and the dull of it which give to satin first position in the list of favorite dress materials. The thought of a fabric which reversed forms a self-trim appeals to the home dressmaker and the professional stylist alike. Another point of interest in regard to the now-so-popular satin is its excellent wearing quality. Still another virtue to add to its list is that it comes in a range of desirable colorings as well as black. Which all goes to show that the woman who chooses high-grade satin crepe for the making of a practical, stylish daytime dress, will make no mistake.

The picture suggests a charming way for the home dressmaker to fashion a frock of crepe satin. Of course black is always a safe and satisfactory buy, but this model would also be wonderfully attractive of beige crepe satin, and colorings along light tans are very highly acceptable, according to word from Parisian couturiers. Jungle green, navy blue or chanel red are modish wearable colors for daytime frocks and are much used.

If economy demands that one dress be made to do duty for several, then by all means decide upon the all-black crepe satin. Select a pattern which provides a removable vestee, with the idea you are going to make several of these separate vestees or gilets as the French designers call them.

It is well to make first a vestee of the black satin itself, reversing it to contrast with the luster or dull of the dress according to the way it has been fashioned. Just to enliven it why not use mirror buttons down the front of this gilet? Mirror buttons are newer than glass ones and they sparkle most effectively.

Be sure to make a plaited georgette vestee for pink touches on black express a very popular idea. By the way, the new spangle trimming is lovely in pink. A bit of it at neck or sleeves of the black satin frock would be adorable. Of course you will want to include a set and lace set of collars and cuffs, also vestee, among accessories which will transform one black satin frock as occasion may require.

Apropos of the vogue for novelty woolens, the Parisian couturiers are creating ensembles for street wear and sports of fine cloth. The mode is interpreted in a very new compose of skirt, short coat and cape. These three-in-one outfits are much liked not only because of their unique departure from the regulation cloth suit, but the cape being detachable, the costume lends itself admirably to indoor daytime wear as well as in the open air.

The use of fancy worsted weaves with solid colored cloth affords opportunity to express many striking combinations. The suit to the left in the picture shows a charming illustration of the short coat and cape version. It employs a navy suede cloth for the shapely cape and youthful coat, using a blended plaid woolen for the skirt, facing revers and cuffs to match.

Frock of Crepe Satin.

All of novelty weave kasha cloth is the costume to the right, although plaiting the cape and the skirt, as the picture shows, appears as if two materials were combined.

Expressing somewhat the same idea is a stunning three-piece knitted suit which is receiving Parisian endorsement. This features the skirt and the cape of solid colored plain knit. The sweater and folded-back facings along each side of the front of the cape show a fancy striped knitted effect, using three colors. A charming exponent of this model reveals the plain knitted portion in lavender-blue, the sweater and cape revers being striped in pink, lavender, blue and white.

Two Paris Designs.

Suits similar to the navy and plaid described above are also developed in velveteen for the cape and coatee, creating the skirt of plaided print velvet or taffeta. Warm winter colorings add charm to this mode. A handsome black velvet cape suit creates cape, coat and skirt of the velvet. To be worn under the coat the designer evolves a gay metal brocade blouse.

Drugs Excite the Kidneys, Drink Water

Take Salts at First Sign of Bladder Irritation or Backache

The American men and women must guard constantly against kidney trouble because we often eat too much rich food. Our blood is filled with acids which the kidneys strive to filter out; they weaken from overwork, become sluggish, the eliminative tissues clog and the result is kidney trouble bladder weakness and a general decline in health.

When your kidneys feel like lumps of lead; your back hurts or the urine is cloudy, full of sediment, or you are obliged to seek relief two or three times during the night; if you suffer with sick headache, or dizzy, nervous spells, acid stomach, or if you have rheumatism when the weather is bad, begin drinking lots of good soft water and get from your pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts. Take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate clogged kidneys, to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer are a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure, makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink and belongs in every home, because nobody can make a mistake by having a good kidney flushing any time.

He saw her eyes widen suddenly, looking beyond him, through the gap between him and Cox, at something that riveted her attention. A touch on his elbow distracted him from the incident. Burns, the superintendent of cement construction, whispered anxiously.

"Feely has just come through Number One flow conduit," he said. "Reports a crack in the roof."

Caleb slid out of his seat and drew the superintendent to one side. This was startling news. Caleb had prepared all the specifications for the tunnels. The responsibility for their efficiency was all his. If the weight of the fifty feet of gravel threatened the roof of the conduit any disaster, even a temporary delay for repair, would mar the demonstration. It might be kept private but the stigma would rest on Caleb professionally.

"I'll look at it myself," he said. "It may be only superficial. If it seems dangerous, we'll shore with timber immediately and close the conduit. Number Two will have to supply the intake. Where's Feely now?"

"Gone to inspect Number Two."

"Good. Wait for my report, Burns. Feely may be an alarmist, though he was perfectly right to report. Go back to your seat. I'll be here again as soon as I can."

He hurried down the road to the gatehouse as fast as he could go afoot. The cars were parked and he did not want to draw attention to his sudden disappearance, by taking one. If his absence was marked he wished to make it as inconspicuous as possible. Hinckley was talking as he left the bower.

Anxiety deepened as he went, imagination widening the flaw while he rapidly went over the details of reinforcement and the building of the forms, the mixing of the cement. He had followed Hinckley's ancient example and had practically inspected every wheelbarrow load of the stuff, impressing rigidly on all hands the necessity for prime materials and absolute following of the formula. He felt certain his figures, his computations of stress and thrust and resistance were correct, allowing ample margin. Yet—if the tunnel gave way, the glory of his achievement was tarnished.

He did not wait for slicker or rubber boots but went swiftly down the ladders, an electric torch in his pocket. Burns had told him the crack was midway between the filter-gallery gate and the forebay pit. With the beam of the torch boring into the black tunnel he fairly ran through the film of water underfoot, his splashing footfalls resounding in the confined space, his head bowed to avoid the roof, counting his strides to calculate the distance. Three hundred yards in he began to spray the roof with light, going more slowly. Eighty yards further the light betrayed the crack. It extended halfway across the level summit of the top of the conduit and a little way down one of the slopes. At first glimpse it yawned ominously, a black split across the gray circle illumined on the cement.

Caleb thrust the tips of his fingers into it, probing. And sighed with sudden relief. It was shallow and there was no sign of any bulge about it. It was a superficial crack to which any cement face is subject. In the hurry of final preparation, when the form boards had been stripped, it had not been noticed, might not have actually developed until later. The interior surface of the tunnel had not been faced, the grain of the form boards still showed. A board insufficiently soaked before pouring, or with knotted fibers that had resisted the water, might have clung to the cement. There might have happened to be a small streak with too much sand. In that one spot the tamping might have been insufficient. It amounted to nothing as regards the stability of the structure.

But he stayed to make certain, wanting to be satisfied that the rush of water would not enlarge the fissure. Later he would have it filled but, for today, he needed both conduits to make an efficient display.

Suddenly, while he probed, he became aware of water swirling about his ankles, of a hissing noise that rose swiftly to a roar, re-echoing from wall to roof as the water swiftly deepened, eddying above his shoes in a savage rush that tugged and lifted, that threatened his purchase on the slippery floor.

Some one had opened the watergate from the filter-gallery! Against all orders. And he was trapped. By the ladders, a quarter of a mile away, the dim light sifting down the shaft showed the gray leap of the ten-foot cascade foaming into the conduit, the push of half-a-mile of solid water held in the six-foot gallery back of it.

The floor was slightly inclined to facilitate the flow. With the gate fully open the flood would sweep down the conduit with velocity and power sufficient to tear away all obstructions. His only hope lay in reaching the ladders. Behind him, four hundred yards back, was the forebay.

Against the increasing tide Caleb made his rush, desperate, feeling it useless but determined to battle for his chance. The water boiled to his knees, sucking at him, clutching at his feet, the tunnel resounding with its mammified chucklings. A foot slipped and he thrust both hands suddenly against the angles of the roof, limpeting his palms to the cement, dropping the torch of necessity. Save for the gray light at the bottom of the shaft, lessening as the gate lifted and the water rose in turmoil, he was in darkness. Up it came and a swirling lunge almost flung him down. Once engulfed it would be all over with him. He could not dream of holding his own for a moment in the torrent which would tumble him, filling his lungs, and hurl him into the forebay pit, perhaps carry him on, a sodden corpse, to the intake; drowned, battered, slain in his own contrivance!

The details of his fate, his helplessness, crowded his mind. Then he was forced to slowly give way, sliding gradually back, pressing his feet into the angles of floor and sides, cupping his palms against the damp ceiling. He thought of the crack. If he could get his fingers into that he might gain purchase enough to hold fast. But he was in the dark. He flung up one hand at the risk of going down and it scraped along the top of the tunnel. Back, back, inch by inch, foot by foot . . .!

There it was at last! He forced his finger tips into the fissure and braced himself again. It could not be for long. His head was bent, his neck cramped. Soon the waters must reach his mouth and nose—but long before that the force of the torrent would have swept him away. The loud lapping of it was confusing. It sounded triumphant, as if a multitude of water-devils were laughing at his plight. The compressing air made his ears buzz and he began to get dizzy.

There were no vivid flashes of former life. Betty's face, smiling at him after he had made his speech, came up once before him. Life had played a scurvy trick on him. It was very close to the end of things for Caleb Warner, engineer. The icy chill of the water sapped his vitality. Now it gurgled about his lower ribs, almost to his heart. With feet wide apart, one palm splayed against the roof, fingers of the other hand crooked into the little crack, he resisted with all the strength he knew must prove inadequate. His jaw was set, his muscles rigid. He snarled in the blackness, forced to lean backward against the force of the mounting flood.

"Well, here I go," he muttered. There was no philosophy in the statement, no bravado, only the submission of a brave man who accepts the inevitable.

One foot slipped again, was sucked out, trailing in the tide. But he got it down, battling to the last spark of his vitality, every remnant of energy centered in the will to cling, to fight off collapse. Seconds passed that seemed like hours, his brain became a blank. Dimly thought formulated. The water was no longer rising. It strengthened, his brain cleared to the fact that spurred his weariness to hope. Some one was at the gate—closing it. He could have shouted as he knew the race subsiding, down to his waist, his thighs, ever lower while the roar lessened, the chuckling ceased, but he emitted only a hoarse croak. Revulsion gripped him and left him weak for a few moments before he started to wade toward the ladders while the cataract lost form, reduced finally to a mere dribble spurting underneath the vertical shut-off.

As he clasped the lower rungs, sudden rage possessed him to find the man who had disobeyed his orders. The wrath renewed all his vitality and he climbed swiftly toward the head of the shaft and the blessed light.

A sight met his eyes as his head emerged above the gatehouse floor that sent him vaulting from the shaft over the piperail that guarded it. The wheel that controlled the gate was down and, across the coaming of its threaded rod, lay Betty Clinton, one hand still clutching the rim of the wheel. Her hat was off and her hair streamed loose, framing the pallor of her face. One sleeve of her white serge coat had been torn away and the shoulder ripped. Her flimsy blouse was in shreds, the fair white skin of arm and neck and rounding bosom showed where a rude hand had torn her undergarment. He had an impression—no more—of a shadow rising by the door and vanishing. He had eyes only for the girl, consciousness only of her plight and the knowledge that she had closed the gate and saved him after some desperate fight.

He took her in his arms and raised her, limp and pitiable. A red blotch on her curving shoulder and marks on her wrist were already purpling into angry bruises. He called to her, but she did not respond. There was a rough bench in the place and he laid her on it, catching down a sweater jacket from a nail—it belonged to the gatetender, who had gone to get his share of the barbecue—and he buttoned it around her before he ran out of the gatehouse for aid.

The speeches were over, the crowd getting into their cars ready to complete the trip. They would not come in this direction, he knew, and shouted at the top of his lungs to attract attention. He felt that Betty was not badly hurt, beyond bruises and shock, but he felt helpless; not wanting to leave her, not knowing what best to do. There were thousands of gallons of water under his feet, but none with which to revive her, save that which dripped from his clothes. A woman was needed—perhaps a doctor. He did not want to take her into the curious crowd.

He shouted again just as a car broke from the ruck and came down towards the gatehouse. The occupants saw him waving, if they did not hear him, they sensed trouble in his pose and the car leaped ahead under the flow of gas. It was Cox, with Burns, coming to see what delayed him. The superintendent had told the president that Warner was giving the tunnel final inspection.

As the car came up Caleb hailed Cox.

"There's been an accident," he said. "Foul play of some kind. Nothing serious, but I want Mrs. Carquines to attend to Miss Clinton. She was attacked, trying to save me. You know Mrs. Carquines, Cox, she'll be by my car. Get her."

"Wife of the artist? I remember her. Do you want Burns?"

But Caleb had turned back into the gatehouse. Cox's driver turned the car on the ramp and the car went back at full speed. Burns halted in the doorway, uncertain at the sight of Caleb kneeling beside Betty Clinton. The girl was reviving, saying something to him.

"No place for me," Burns told himself. "I can't do anything in there." He turned his back, waiting for reinforcements.

"You're safe!" Betty raised her head and Caleb pillowed it on his arm.

"Yes, thanks to you," he said. "What happened?"

"Oh, I'm so glad." Sudden tears choked her utterance and she began to sob hysterically.

The car came racing back again with Carquines and his wife in the tonneau with Maria. Luis Padilla on the running board.

Maria swept Caleb aside, her eyes resenting Mrs. Carquines as she loosed a rush of Spanish with her arms about her senorita. Betty Clinton fought off her hysteria, braced at the entrance of the rest, and sat up.

"I'm all right, Maria," she said. "You'll want to know what happened. I saw, that gentleman"—she looked at Burns, hovering in the background with Padilla—"speak to Mr. Warner. Then you left the tables." She turned to talk directly to Caleb.

"I thought that something had gone wrong, by your face, and I watched you going toward the gatehouse. I saw a man pass one of the openings in the screens and follow you. I had seen him before, looking in from where the food was served, back of where you sat. Just before you left. He had a beard, he looked rough and wild. His eyes were glittering like a mad dog's. I fancied I knew him somehow and I tried to remember where. I knew the memory was in some way sinister—. It may have been intuition, but it possessed me. So I slipped from my seat while Mr. Hinckley was speaking and went to where I could watch the road. You were nearly at the gatehouse, almost running. And this other man was running, too, not on the road but among the sage, bent double, lurching as if he was drunk, trying not to be seen, following you. A figure of evil. And I suddenly placed him. I knew it was Baxter! And I was sure he meant harm to you!

"I should have used my head better," she confessed, color coming back to her cheeks, slowly spreading over face and neck under Caleb's gaze. "At least I should have called Luis, but I only thought of one thing, to warn you. I think that even then I guessed what was going to happen. That you were going into the tunnel—and Baxter . . .!

Happiness Recipe

USES FOR THE GUMMED-PAPER DRESS FORM

Local Leader Demonstrating Use of Dress Form in a Platte County, Missouri, Community.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

A remarkable impetus was given to home sewing through the teaching, in connection with extension work for rural women, of the method of making a gummed-paper dress form. As the popularity of this sewing accessory has spread over the entire country, it would be difficult to say where it originated, or to estimate with any accuracy the number that have been made altogether. Reports received by the United States Department of Agriculture from several of the Western states say that home demonstration agents are no longer called upon to explain how paper dress forms are made because practically every woman who wants one has one.

Uses Are Innumerable.

The uses to which the dress form can be put are innumerable. First and most important is its use in fitting oneself; that is exceedingly necessary when the farm home is located at a considerable distance from the nearest neighbor, and time is too precious to spend running back and forth for help in fittings. The women in the Missouri group illustrated are adapting a commercial pattern to an individual form, preparatory to making a permanent foundation pattern. If there is a member of the family away from home, the dress form made from her exact figure is especially valuable, used in connection with such a plain foundation or guide pattern. For example, the daughter at college who has left her "form" with her mother can send home a sketch or picture or commercial pattern she likes, and receive a properly fitting dress as soon as the mother finds time to make it.

Fitting Over Garments.

Another way in which the dress form is a blessing to the home sewer is in fitting over garments bought ready made. Straps on petticoats and brassieres are often too long or too near the armpits, and it is exceedingly difficult to get them just right on oneself. Again a ready-made dress may need minor adjustments on the shoulders or hip line, to set well, and here the dress form helps. Nothing is more exasperating than to sew on a washable collar and find that the ends do not come where they should. If they are first pinned in place on the form such wasted labor, and much irritation, are avoided. The woman with a talent for designing her own clothes can work out her ideas directly on the form.

OLD-FASHIONED BOILED DINNER

With Corned Beef as Main Feature It Is Popular.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

On a good many days there is need for a dinner easily prepared which will almost cook itself while the housewife is busy with cleaning, turning out closets, or possibly with garden work. For such days the old-fashioned "boiled-dinner" answers every purpose, with its corned beef as the main feature, and the mixture of vegetables usually associated with it. There is an important difference, however, in the modern method of cooking this dinner as compared with the way in which it would still be prepared in many country districts. This difference is in the attention given to short cooking the vegetables, all of which, of course, require far less time than the corned beef. In the old-fashioned "boiled dinner" the vegetables were often "boiled to death," at least the vitamines in them were, and so the dinner defeated the very purpose it was intended to serve—that of being a means of combining various vegetables in one dish.

The right way of cooking a boiled dinner suggested by the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, therefore, is to cook the meat alone until it is thoroughly done. If you have a fireless cooker you will find it very useful for this. As the vegetables are to be cooked only for the shortest possible time, it will be easier to finish the cooking on the top of the stove.

You will require about 2½ pounds of corned beef, which should be mostly lean. Of course, if you prefer to use ham, tongue, salt pork or any other cured meat you may do so, or use fresh meat if your family likes it better. In that case select any of the somewhat cheaper cuts of lean meat suitable for stewing or pot roasting. There should be, as a rule, at least one and preferably two other vegetables besides potatoes. This recipe suggests small quantities of six vegetables which combine well in flavor, but if you do not have all of them on hand, use what you can get or add others. String beans, beets or tomatoes might be added or substituted for any of the following:

Here is our list of ingredients: 2½ pounds of lean corned beef, 2 white or yellow turnips, 4 or 5 carrots, 3 medium-sized onions, 1 small bunch of celery, 2 potatoes, ½ head of cabbage; green if possible; 2 or 3 quarts of water to cover, and salt if needed. Cut the onions in halves and the other vegetables into quarters or pieces of desirable size. Cut the cabbage into slices suitable for serving.

If the meat be from a particularly strong cure or is particularly high in salt, it may be best to parboil it by bringing it slowly to a simmer, and then simmering it for 10 minutes.

GOOD CENTER FOR PREPARING FOOD

An Oilcloth-Covered Work Counter Is Quite Handy.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Very simple and easily arranged is this oilcloth-covered work counter next to the sink, where food may be prepared with the least possible effort. The good light from two windows is a great advantage as well as the high stool the home maker occupies while at work. In the closet below the counter are seen supplies in glass jars, well protected from insects and mice. The shelves of the lower closet are also covered with oilcloth.

Good Light From Windows Is Big Advantage.

Hooks on the door of the closet afford a place where such implements as egg beaters and measuring spoons can be hung immediately after they are washed, and used without leaving one's seat on the high stool. There is even a place in this attractive kitchen for a few flowers on the window sill to be enjoyed in the midst of one's household duties. The picture was taken by the United States Department of Agriculture in Utah.

Dark Vinegar

The pronounced darkening which sometimes occurs in vinegar is in nearly every instance due to the presence of an iron salt which, combining with tannin, a common constituent of vinegar, causes darkening. Iron salts, while not a normal constituent of vinegar, may gain entrance in the process of manufacture. The prevention of the darkening of vinegar lies chiefly in the avoiding contact with iron.

ST. JOE MAN KILLED BY DYNAMITE EXPLOSION

Coroner A. N. Adams of Auburn, who held an inquest over the body of Jasper Snyder, aged 71, of near St. Joe, who was killed Wednesday afternoon while blasting a tree, gave his verdict as accidental death.

The body was found by Mr. Snyder's daughter, Mrs. Stella Hughes who was at her parents home caring for her mother who is sick in bed with high blood pressure.

According to the testimony at the inquest, Mr. Snyder, instead of cutting down a tree in his front yard, decided to blow it out of the ground. He used a charge of dynamite but it failed to explode. He went into the house and remarked that he would try again, saying that the first fuse "was no good."

The second charge took effect and as she heard the report of the explosion Mrs. Hughes went to a front window to see its effect. Not seeing her father, Mrs. Hughes went to another window thinking he might have run around the house to get away from the tree before it fell. She saw what she thought was a handkerchief blown in the air and then she went out in the yard, finding the body of her father in a ditch near the tree where the charge had blown him. His head and arms were mangled badly and death was instantaneous.

The deceased lived on a twelve acre piece of land near St. Joe. He is survived by his wife and eight chidren.

LIFE HISTORY

Jasper Snyder was born in Allen county, Ohio, on March 29, 1855. He spent his boyhood days in Shaunee township, near Lima, Ohio.

He was united in marriage to Alice Ann Larkey on October 5, 1873. To this union were born eleven children, three of whom preceded him in death. He moved his family to Paulding county, Ohio, in 1885. He united with the Christian church at Hedges, Ohio, in 1886 and was an elder of this church for many years. He then came to Indiana in 1908 and united with the Christian church at St. Joe.

While working on his farm he met with an accident about 1:15 Wednesday afternoon, November 17th, which resulted in his death. He leaves to mourn his departure, his wife and eight children, Calvin, Warren, Donald, Florence and Floyd of Fort Wayne, Stella and Jay of St. Joe and Ella of Auburn, Also twenty-eight grandchildrn, three great grandchildren and a host of relatives and friends.

The funeral was held from the Christian church, St. Joe, Saturday afternoon at 1:30, with interment in Riverside cemetery. Rev. J. O. Rose of Angola, officiating. E. R. Kinsey, funeral director.

CARD OF THANKS

In our deep sorrow an expression of appreciation is given our many friends for their kindness shown.

Parent-Teacher Association

The November meeting of the P. T. A. was held last Friday night with a good crowd in attendance. The program was carried out as announced last week. Each number was creditably rendered and well received. Mrs. Green gave an interesting report of the State Convention. She also gave some of the purposes of the organization and stated that each association should have a definite aim. She said "find the needs in your own community of the children and young people and then aim to supply those needs."

County Superintendent Green gave a report of the visit here of the State Inspector. Several things were recommended but the report on the whole was complimentary and expressed a satisfaction of the State officials with the condition and progress of our school. He also read the re-issuance of our Commission, making ours a Standard School.

It was announced that an effort is being madee to have Dr. Ada Schweitzer here on Friday night Dec. 3rd. Dr. Schweitzer is on extension work from Indiana University and if she comes here it will be a treat for Concord Township citizens.

After the business session a pot luck lunch and social hour were enjoyed.

Mr. Maxwell, chairman of the a membership of 90 with prospects of still further enrollment.

FROM OUR FILES OF JANUARY 11, 1900

The following personals are taken from The News of 26 years ago. The paper was edited by M. E. Olds:

Frank Meese moved over into Hamburg this week.

The Handle Factory received an order this week for five car loads of handles.

Mr. and Mrs. Sam Widney returned from their visit to Bellville, Ohio, yesterday.

Rev. Johnson is still continuing his revival services at Fairview with good results.

Last Sunday was the 25th anniversary of M. T. Bishop's marriage. It was his "Silver Wedding," and there is no telling how much of that kind of metal he might have received had he made a "bee" and invited us all in.

Ed Woodcox had the misfortune to lose part of one of his fingers last week. He was working in Filley & Grubb's saw-mill and in some way his hand caught in a rope and tore one of his fingers so badly that Dr. Bowman had to amputate it at the first joint. As a consequence Ed will have to carry his arm in a sling for several days.

Harper Leighty came home from Iowa last week where he has been working on the railroad. He reports work a little slack out there just now.

Charlie Donaldson was married at Edgerton last week to Miss Eva Mortland. Charlie's friends here wish him and his young bride a happy voyage down the stream of life.

A pleasant social gathering was held at the home of W. C. Patterson on Thursday evening of last week. It was a farewell party to Miss Bessie, who left the following day for Cincinnatti to be absent several months.

W. H. McIntosh of Auburn, was in town last Saturday and made The News office a pleasant call. He says that he always likes to come to St. Joe and that from almost any point of view he considers this town one of the most enterprising and up-to-date villages on the map.

Wm. DeMaranville of Auburn, attended the installation of G. A. R. officers at this place Saturday evening. He informs us that unless there is a hitch in the arrangements he expects to move back on the Hale farm in the spring. Everybody will be glad to see William become a resident of this neighborhood again.

Several little folks enjoyed a pleasant party and supper at the home of Frank Barney on Saturday evening.

Miss Lulu Bodey, who returned from Chicago last week, has just completed a thorough course of instruction in one of the best millinery establishments in that city, and is now a competent milliner.

John Allen's house had a narrow escape from being burned last week. While Mrs. Allen was out calling on a neighbor, fire got out of the sitting room stove in some way and burned quite a hole in the carpet before it was discovered.

Work and its Reward
By O. Lawrence Hawthorne

Do your work!
No matter what the task may be,
Attack it with heroic zeal.
Be not content until you see
Accomplishment, until you feel
That satisfaction gained alone
Through sense of duty nobly done;
So is your honest value shown,
So is appreciation won.

Do your work!
Not just the labor specified,
But with a willing heart do more.
Let loyal service be your guide!
The joys of life are waiting for
That man who never fails to do
His very best, and he will find
Untold reward in purpose true
And self-respect and peace of mind.

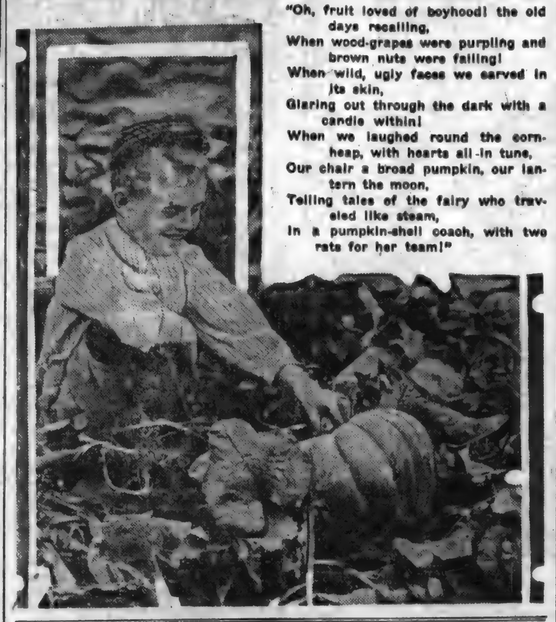
SELECTING THE "PUNKIN"



"Oh, fruit loved of boyhood! the old days recalling,
When wood-grapes were purpling and brown nuts were falling!
When wild, ugly faces we carved in its skin,
Glaring out through the dark with a candle within!
When we laughed round the corn-heap, with hearts all in tune,
Our chair a broad pumpkin, our lantern the moon,
Telling tales of the fairy who traveled like steam,
In a pumpkin-shell coach, with two rats for her team!"

Thanksgiving Day Festival Long Known to Man

In All Ages Special Occasions for Rejoicing Have Called for Observance.

Thanksgiving day is older than the authentic records of history. For victory won, calamity survived, for good hunting, man was assuredly giving thanks long before he knew how to classify himself in the world in which he lived.

If the latest deductions of the scientists are right, man was contemporaneous with some of the great beasts, reptiles and birds which it was once thought had the earth to themselves. There must have been some rare outbursts of joy in that long ago when our ancestors occasionally got the best of an ichthyosaurus, put a dinosaur out of business, knocked out a dinotherium, or killed a mammoth. These were impromptu thanksgivings, however, and usually of a strictly private nature. It wasn't safe in those days to make too much noise about such a victory; the response might come in the guise of a new attack by a monster of land or air, or from humans whose desire to kill might be based on jealousy, greed or mere lust for conquest. It is more than likly that the victorious individual or family told the story of his or their prowess to a select few in the recesses of their caves, when the entrances thereto had been made secure for the night.

First Formal Thanksgiving.

Newfoundland was the scene of the first recorded formal Thanksgiving service held on the continent. That was in 1557, and it was conducted by a clergyman who accompanied the expedition which under Sir Martin Frobisher, a noted navigator and explorer, had brought the first English immigrants to settle in North America. That must have been a strange and picturesque ceremony. Of itself the Atlantic sea voyage in that age was an adventure few but the most adventurous undertook without fear. To the perils of the sea to what then served for ships, had to be added the dangers from ships of other nations, and from the freebooters who knew neither flag nor race when they had a chance to loot and slay. Frobisher and his rough sailormen, no doubt, took part in the service, though they would not be so impressed as were the settlers at being on land again even though that land was strange, and their hearts full of fears and anxieties.

It is a far cry from that observance in the ancient colony to the Thanksgiving of the present generation. To the youth the day is synonymous with holiday attractions, roast turkey, and other appetizing delicacies. To their elders there is interwoven in the joys of family reunions and social intercourse and thanksgiving for the harvests, tender thoughts and sincere tributes to the men whose valor and endurance in the World war gave our country a new status in world leadership.

Pilgrims' Celebration.

There have been some changes in time and methods of observing the day on this continent, since Frobisher's time, though the basic principle has remained. The Pilgrim Fathers gave to it a coloring that has not faded out entirely through succeeding centuries. At the "ingathering" of their first harvest in 1621, the people who had come from the old one to establish a New England, held a service and celebration. Governor Bradford sent out four men to shoot wild fowl, and they bagged enough, mostly turkey according to the chroniclers, to satisfy all the company for about a week.

Edward Winslow, one of the Mayflower's company, thus wrote of the celebration to an English friend:

"Our harvest being gotten in our governor sent four men on fowling, that so we might, after a special manner, rejoice together after we had gathered the fruit of our labors.

Provided for Feast.

"They four in one day killed as many fowl as, with a little help beside, served the company almost a week, at which time, amongst other recreations, we exercised our arms, many of the Indians coming amongst us, and among the rest their greatest king, Massasot, with some ninety men, whom for three days we entertained and feasted; and they went out and killed five dear, which they brought to the plantation, and bestowed on our governor, and on the captain and the others.

"And although it is not always so plentiful as it was at this time with us, yet by the goodness of God, we are so far from want, that we wish you partakers of our plenty."

Miles Standish is said to have been the captain of those who "exercised" their arms and the armed men under him are reputed to have numbered a few more than twenty on this occasion.

Trials of endurance, races on land and water, and exhibitions of skill were part of the celebration from day to day.

Feast Not Complete Without the Pumpkin

To the ringing chorus of praise to corn and wheat, to dairy cow and beef steer, to fattening porker and fleece-lined sheep, we desire here and now to add our piping voice in a word of praise to the punkin. Not pumpkin—punkin. Nestling in yellow, globular beauty amidst the corn rows, the glorious pie punkin gives promise of gustatory delights in the immediate future. Gazing upon the punkin's golden rotundity one may almost catch the incense of spice and cinnamon, and taste the richness that is soon to be. Flecking the brown and sere fields with specks of gold, even as the auriferous metal flecks the quartz wrested from Mother Earth by the pick of the miner, the pie punkin adds to human comfort while contributing to human delight.

Of humble station, with few to sing its praises, it has been the standby of succeeding generations. Demanding little, it gives much. Without it Thanksgiving would be a hollow mockery. It graces alike the table of the rich and aristocratic, and the table of the toiler in humble place. It has all season for its own, for it may be dried in festoons from the rafters of the humble cottage, or canned for storage in the cellars of the well-to-do.—Omaha Bee.

SHORT FEED CROP MAKE GOOD FEEDING ESSENTIAL

There will be no feed surplus this year. The production of feed grains and hay in 1926 was less bountiful than in 1925, but with the proper distribution, there will be enough to go around.

Last year's crop production was heavy and a total of over 225 millions of tons of feed were produced. This year conditions have not been so favorable, and the prospects are for a total feed production of 213,000,000 tons, 5.3 per cent below last year's production, and about 6 per cent under the average for the past five years. Both concentrates and roughages are affected by this drop, but the former is the more vital, including as it does corn, which is by far the most important feed crop produced.

The shortage in the feed crop production this year is not as serious as might first appear because of the heavy carryover from last year's bumper crops, particularly corn and oats. Then, too, the smaller number of livestock, is a big factor. The horse and mule population is more than 10 per cent under the five-year average and still decreasing, the beef and dairy cattle are 8 per cent under, and the hog population about 12 per cent below the average. This means that the lowered feed crop production this year will be balanced by the reduction in the number of livestock, and will not necessitate reduced feeding.

For the most economical production of butterfat, pork, eggs, and other farm products, the matter of proper feeding is the most important factor. Therefore, with no oversupply of good grain feeds on farms at this time, it will pay big to give special attention to feeding well and without waste. Dairy cows will maintain their body weight and good health on a liberal supply of good alfalfa hay and corn silage, all they will clean up at each feeding. For milk production they need additional feed in the form of a well-balanced grain mixture, fed at the rate of one pound to every three or four pounds of milk produced. Corn, of course, is the cheapest and most efficient hog feed in midwest state. When it is supplemented with skimmilk, an ideal feed for hogs is made. A good dry mash and skimmilk with the regular scratch grains for poultry is the secret of large and most economical egg production in winter.

At present the ration between feed costs and livestock prices makes feed operations profitable, and it is not expected that prices will advance sufficiently to eliminate the margin of profits in converting feed into meat and animal products. However, with closer adjustment of feed supply to demand, it is probable that the general trend of the feed market will be irregularly upward.

SPENCERVILLE HIGH DOWNS PLEASANT LAKE

Red and White Win in Last Minute on Foul

Spencerville, Ind., Nov. 20.—The Spencerville High School net team defeated the fast Pleasant Lake squad here last night by the close score of 19-18. This was one of the fastest games seen on the local floor this season. The floor work of Furnish and Musser and the basket shooting of Bowser were features of the game.

The Garrett grades defeated the Spencerville grades in the preliminary game. Two black players on the Garrett squad added a touch of color to the game and were a source of amusement to the crowd.

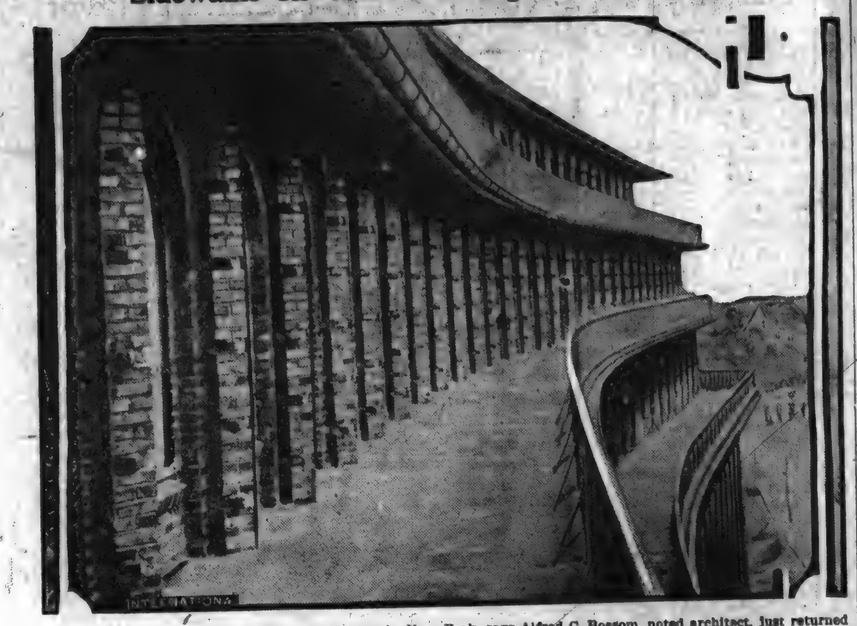
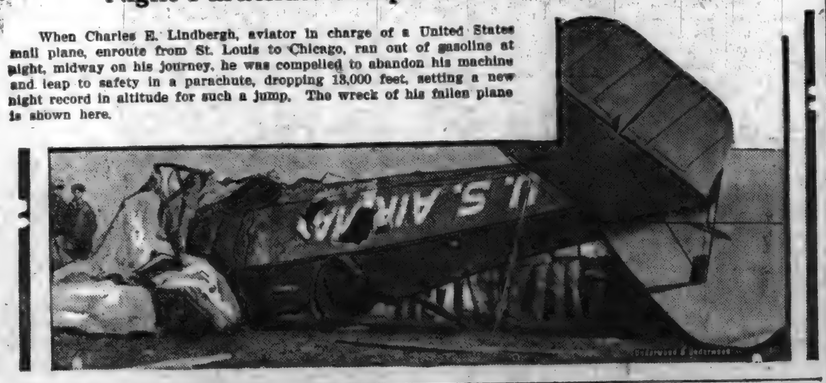
Sidewalks on Office Buildings Are Predicted



This new type of building will soon be seen in New York, says Alfred C. Bossom, noted architect, just returned from abroad. With sidewalks on the building this way, employees can enjoy a walk in the fresh air during lunch hour, away from the street noises. This is the Chili building in Hamburg, Germany, designed by Fritz Koeger.

Night Parachute Jump Saved Pilot From This

When Charles E. Lindbergh, aviator in charge of a United States mail plane, enroute from St. Louis to Chicago, ran out of gasoline at night, midway on his journey, he was compelled to abandon his machine and leap to safety in a parachute, dropping 13,000 feet, setting a new night record in altitude for such a jump. The wreck of his fallen plane is shown here.



BEST FARM WORKER

After a national contest, Homer Sheffield, sixteen, of Crosby, Texas, has been declared the outstanding boys' agricultural club worker in the United States. He joined the Crosby club six years ago and since then has won every possible honor and scholarship in Texas. He is astute in business, and when cotton would bring only $50 per bale during a slump, he contracted with a mattress factory to make 10 mattresses from a bale for $100, selling them at $25 each. Thus he made a good profit while others lost.

ARRESTED AS A SPY

POULTRY

RAISE CHICKENS ON SALT RATION

Contrary to a general belief among poultrymen that chickens are very readily poisoned by common table salt, it was found in experiments at the college of agriculture, University of Illinois, that chickens may be raised from nine to twenty-one weeks of age on rations containing as high as 8 per cent of salt with no apparent detrimental effects on their condition. The experiments further showed that after the birds had become accustomed to such salty rations, they ate enough of them to keep on growing about as fast as chickens that received a much smaller percentage of salt in their feed. The experiments were conducted by H. H. Mitchell, chief in animal nutrition; L. E. Card, chief in poultry husbandry, and G. G. Garman, formerly assistant in animal nutrition.

Because of the general belief that chickens are very readily poisoned by common table salt, and because of the common occurrence of salt in wastes and by-product feeds for poultry, it was considered important to determine definitely whether the use of such wastes and feeds is dangerous to health or retards growth. This experiment was planned, therefore, in order to determine (1) the maximum percentage of salt that may be fed to growing chickens without harmful results, and (2) the maximum single dose of salt that a chicken can tolerate, or the smallest dose that would cause death.

In all, 75 chickens from three breeds were used. Fifty chickens were given a basal ration made up of yellow corn, bran, dried buttermilk, steamed bone meal and ground limestone, containing percentages of salt of 1, 2, 4 and 8. Twenty-five other chickens were used in determining the maximum single dose of salt that an adult chicken can tolerate.

It was found that chickens could be raised from nine to twenty-one weeks of age on rations containing as high as 8 per cent of salt with no apparently detrimental effects. While it took some time for the chickens to become accustomed to such a salty ration, they soon learned to eat enough of it to promote a rate of growth approximately the same as that of chickens fed the check ration.

When the salt was mixed in the feed, a daily intake of 6 to 8 grams of salt a bird appeared to have no harmful effect on the birds that were 9 weeks old or older.

Salt put directly into the crop in two equal doses amounting to 12 to 16 grams daily was quickly fatal in the case of birds weighing 2 to 4 pounds each.

Salt given in solution twice daily proved to be more toxic than equal amounts consumed in the feed.

The minimum lethal single dose of salt for birds weighing 3 to 5 pounds was found to be close to 4 grams a kilogram of body weight.

Profitable Place for Ducks on Average Farm

Few people realize the profitable place the duck should have on the farm. There was a time when the duck was not a profit but that time is long past. With better feeding methods of poultry and the better understanding of the care they should have the duck is rapidly coming to the front.

The Pekin duck is a meat bird and should be considered as such. However, it is not uncommon to get 140 eggs in a season with proper feed.

The breeders should be selected early in the summer and fed on a grain ration until the first of December, then put on a mash. We have found a good mash to be made of equal parts of ground corn, ground oats, bran, shorts, low-grade flour and meat scraps, says a writer in the Indiana Farmer's Guide. This should be fed wet twice each day, night and morning, with grain at noon.

It is not necessary to have water for the ducks to swim in, but the fertility of the eggs will be better if water is available. Water to swim in is a detriment to young stock that is grown for the market, for the exercise makes the meat tough and stringy and they do not put on fat very fast.

Housing Old Ducks

Old ducks need no particular care. They should have a place where they can keep dry at night. In the winter any dry house will answer for quarters. They can travel about in the cold and snow during the day, but at night they should have a warm place. Eggs are usually laid in the early morning, so it is advisable to keep the birds shut in until all have laid. Do not try to keep ducks and hens in the same pen. Ducks need a soft feed and they are dirty about their eating.

High Prices for Eggs

Egg production during the months of high prices is a matter of first getting hens that are bred for egg production, and following that with the proper methods of care, feeding and management. Commercial poultry men rather generally sell all two-year-old hens, but breeders keep their best hens for many years in some cases. If a hen possesses valuable characteristics, it is only a matter of common sense to use that hen for a breeder as long as possible.

Lesson for November 28

GIDEON AND THE THREE HUNDRED

LESSON TEXT—Judges 7:1-25.
GOLDEN TEXT—Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might.
PRIMARY TOPIC—Gideon and His Brave Band.
JUNIOR TOPIC—A Brave Leader.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Gideon and the Three Hundred.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Working Together With God.

Because of Israel's sin, God permitted them to be brought under the cruel yoke of bondage at the hands of the Midianites. So grievous was this affliction that they hid in dens, caves and strongholds (Judg. 6:2). In their distress they cried unto the Lord and He sent deliverance to them through the judgeship of Gideon. The angel of the Lord appeared to him while at the post of duty. Gideon hesitated. His hesitancy was not due to unbelief but to modesty and cautiousness. He came from an obscure and uninfluential family (Judg. 6:15). Before going forward in this enterprise he wished to be doubly sure that God had called him (Judg. 6:36-40). The tangible evidence was furnished by means of the fleece. Gideon began his reformatory work at once (Judg. 6:25-27). He not only began at once, but began at home. This is God's order.

I. The Opposing Armies (v. 1).

Gideon and his army arose early on the eventful day of his victory and encamped by the spring of Herrod. Over against them was the host of Midianites in battle array. Gideon's army was quite insignificant in comparison with the Midianites.

II. The Sifting of Gideon's Army (vv. 2-8).

At Gideon's call, 32,000 men responded ready for the struggle. This seemed a small army to go against the Midianite army—135,000 strong, but God said even this was too many, lest they be led to boasting and self-confidence. Their real danger was not in their small army but in their pride. All that were faint-hearted were allowed to go back, leaving only 10,000. There were 22,000 cowards in that group of men and worst of all, they were not ashamed to confess it. Still, this was too many. When God was through with His sifting process only 300 remained. The 10,000 were brave men, but not of proper quality and fitness. Those who lapped the water showed alertness and watchfulness.

III. God Gives Encouragement to Gideon (vv. 9-15).

God commanded Gideon to go down to the Midianite camp where he would hear something that would cheer his heart and strengthen his hands. God always comes to cheer us when our hearts are faint. When he came near he heard a man tell a dream which was that of a barley cake tumbling into the camp and smiting it. He also heard the interpretation given to that dream which made Gideon to be that cake. This greatly cheered his heart and strengthened him for his work and caused him to break forth in praise to God. The barley cake is a very insignificant thing—a very cheap affair in itself, but with the hand of God upon it it would be sufficient to spread consternation among the Midianites and bring destruction upon their armies. No matter how weak and insignificant a man may be, if God is with him he shall not fail.

IV. God Gives Victory to Gideon (vv. 16-23).

His attack was unique. The whole matter was of faith (Heb. 11:32). The ground of his faith was God's Word and the token which He had given him. Gideon with his 300 men formed into three companies, each man being provided with a lamp concealed within a pitcher. Thus armed they surrounded the camp of the Midianites. They were all instructed to keep their eyes upon their leader and imitate him. We too are to keep our eyes on our Leader, Christ, and to ever do as He does. At the proper moment they blew their trumpets and broke their pitchers, giving opportunity for their lights to shine out. This awful crash of breaking pitchers, followed by the sound of trumpets accompanied by the shout "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon" threw the Midianites into a panic, causing them to fight amongst themselves: 120,000 were thus slain, leaving but 15,000 of that mighty army (Judg. 8-10).

In making the application to ourselves in this age, we can think of the sound of the trumpets as representing prayer or calling to God; the torches as the light of the Gospel; the pitchers our human nature, the whole as this treasure in earthen vessels.

IN DAYS OF OUR FOREFATHERS

Women Prepared Their Own Medicines

The wise pioneer women learned to gather, in woods and fields, the remedies the Indians used. From the rafters of colonial houses, hung great bunches of dried roots and herbs. From these, in times of sickness, the busy mother brewed simple and powerful remedies.

From roots and herbs, Lydia E. Pinkham, a descendant of these sturdy pioneers, made her Vegetable Compound. The beneficial effects of this dependable medicine are vouched for by hundreds of women.

Mrs. Wm. Kraft of 2838 Vinewood Ave., Detroit, Mich., saw a Pinkham advertisement in the "News" one day and made up her mind that she would give the Compound a trial. At that time she was very weak. "After the first bottle," she writes, "I began to feel better and like a new woman after taking six bottles. I recommend it to others and always keep a bottle in the house."

Mrs. Gust Green of 401 Lincoln Park Boulevard, Rockford, Illinois, found herself in a condition similar to that of Mrs. Kraft. "I was weak and rundown," she writes, "but the Vegetable Compound has helped me and I feel better now. I recommend it to all women who need more strength."

THREE DAY COLDS THREATEN LUNGS

A cough or cold that hangs on after the third day is a threat.

Do something! Don't wait until it has run its course,—from your head to your throat, chest and bronchial tubes. When you feel a cough or cold spreading down into the bronchial tubes it is in the "danger zone"—for these tubes lead directly into your lungs.

Quickly and unfailingly Ayer's Cherry Pectoral goes straight to the seat of the trouble. Real medicine, reaching deep down with its soothing, healing power. Absorbed through and through the irritated throat, chest and bronchial membranes, it quickly stops the cough, breaks up the cold and brings prompt, lasting relief.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is hospital-proved and prescribed by physicians. Pleasant to taste. All druggists—60c and, twice the quantity, $1.00.

The measure of service is the mark of greatness.

Too Weak To Work

LeRoy, Mich.—"I was troubled with a pain in my right side and in the small of my back. I could not sleep soundly and had no appetite—it seemed that nothing looked good to eat. I was so weak I could scarcely do any work. I wrote to Dr. Pierce, and upon his advice, took three bottles of 'Golden Medical Discovery,' two of 'Favorite Prescription,' and two of the 'Anuric Tablets,' and occasionally a 'Pleasant Pellet' at bedtime, and I gained nine pounds."—Mrs. Arthur Ruppert, Route 1, Box 15a.

Washington First to Call for Day of Thankfulness

Proclamation Made in 1789 Set Apart Day of Rejoicing and for Gratitude.

Thanksgiving day in the United States is a yearly festival of thanksgiving for the mercies of the closing year. The day is fixed by proclamation of the Presidents and the governors of the various states. The President's proclamation makes the day a legal holiday in the District of Columbia, territories and possessions.

In 1789 the Episcopal church formally recognized the civil government's authority to appoint such a feast, and in 1888 the Roman Catholic church also decided to honor a festival which had long been nearly universally observed.

The earliest harvest Thanksgiving in America was kept by the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth in 1621 and was repeated often during that and the ensuing century. Congress recommended days of thanksgiving annually during the Revolution and in 1784 for the return of peace—as did President Madison in 1815, following the close of the second war with Great Britain.

The first truly national Thanksgiving was observed in 1789. The first congress, sitting in New York, then the capital of the young nation, adopted a resolution requesting President Washington to appoint a day of thanksgiving for the general benefit and welfare of the nation.

First Proclamation.

In compliance with the request Washington issued his proclamation October 3, 1789, setting apart Thursday, November 26, as a day "to be devoted by the people of these states to the service of that Great and Glorious Being who is the beneficent author of all the good that was, that is, or that will be." The people were requested to pray for "the pardon of our national and other transgressions; for wise, just and constitutional laws, discreetly and faithfully executed and obeyed; for a larger knowledge and better practice of true religion and virtue and for the increase of science among all mankind."

In 1795 Washington issued his second proclamation appointing a day for a national thanksgiving. In this proclamation, which named February 19 as the day to be observed, the President called attention to the peace and prosperity prevailing throughout the land and asked that thanks be given for the suppression of the insurrection which had "so wantonly threatened" the tranquility of the nation. The insurrection referred to by the President was the so-called "Whisky Rebellion" which had occurred in several counties in western Pennsylvania, caused by the federal tax laid on alcoholic liquors and stills.

Custom Allowed to Lapse.

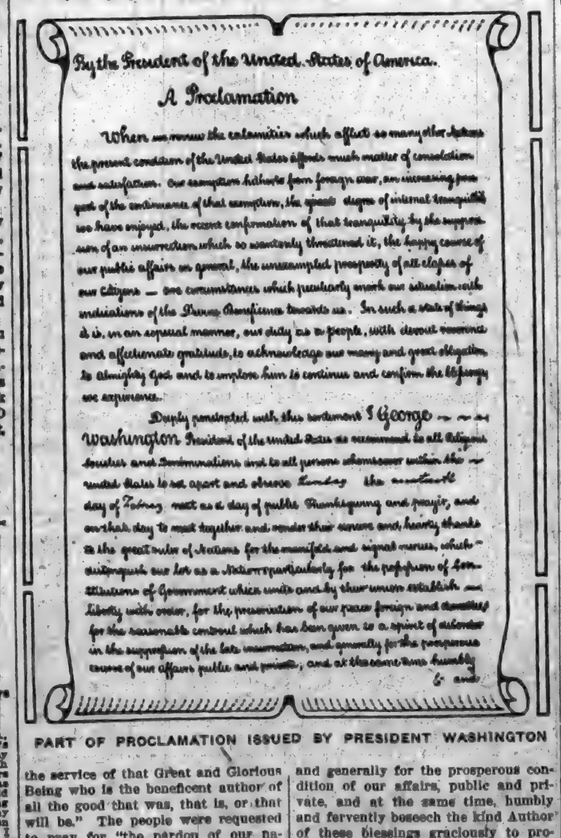
The next Thanksgiving day proclamation was issued by John Adams, the second President, in 1798, and a year later he again appointed a day for a national thanksgiving. No observance of the kind was held during the two administrations of Thomas Jefferson, but in 1815, following the close of the war, the custom was revived by President Madison. Then came a lapse of 47 years, from 1815 until 1862, before the nation again was called upon to give thanks in a proclamation issued by President Lincoln, who summoned his countrymen especially to "acknowledge and render thanks to our Heavenly Father for the signal victories, vouchsafed by Almighty God, to the land and naval forces engaged in suppressing an internal uprising and for averting from our country the dangers of foreign intervention and invasion," since 1863 the Presidents have always issued proclamations appointing the last Thursday in November as Thanksgiving day.

Washington's Appeal.

"When we review the calamities which afflict so many other nations, the present condition of the United States affords much matter of consolation and satisfaction. Our exemption hitherto from foreign war, an increasing prospect of the continuance of that exemption, the great degree of internal tranquillity we have enjoyed, the recent confirmation of that tranquillity by the suppression of an insurrection, which so wantonly threatened it, the happy course of our public affairs in general, the unexampled prosperity of all classes of our citizens, are circumstances which peculiarly mark our situation with indications of the divine beneficence toward us. In such a state of things it is in an especial manner our duty as a people, with devout reverence and affectionate gratitude, to acknowledge our many and great obligations to Almighty God, and to implore Him to continue and confirm the blessings we experienced.

"Deeply penetrated with this sentiment, I, George Washington, President of the United States, do recommend to all religious societies and denominations, and to all persons whomsoever, within the United States, to set apart and observe Thursday, the 19th day of February next, as a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, and on that day to meet together and render sincere and hearty thanks to the great Ruler of nations for the manifold and signal mercies which distinguish our lot as a nation; particularly for the possession of constitutions of government which unite and, by their union, establish liberty with order; for the preservation of our peace, foreign and domestic; for the reasonable control which has been given to a spirit of disorder in the suppression of the late insurrection, and generally for the prosperous condition of our affairs, public and private, and at the same time, humbly and fervently beseech the kind Author of these blessings graciously to prolong them to us; to imprint on our hearts a deep and solemn sense of our obligations to Him for them; to teach us rightly to estimate their immense value; to preserve us from the arrogance of prosperity and from hazarding the advantages we enjoy by delusive pursuits; to dispose us to merit the continuance of His favors by not abusing them, by our gratitude for them, and by a corresponding conduct as citizens, and as men to render this country more and more a safe and propitious asylum for the unfortunate of other countries; to extend among us true and useful knowledge; to diffuse and establish habits of sobriety, order, morality and piety, and finally to impart all the blessings we possess or ask for ourselves to the whole family of mankind.

"In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia the first day of January, 1795."



By the President of the United States of America.

A Proclamation

When we review the calamities which afflict so many other nations the present condition of the United States affords much matter of consolation and satisfaction. Our exemption hitherto from foreign war, an increasing prospect of the continuance of that exemption, the great degree of internal tranquillity we have enjoyed, the recent confirmation of that tranquillity by the suppression of an insurrection which so wantonly threatened it, the happy course of our public affairs in general, the unexampled prosperity of all classes of our citizens — are circumstances which peculiarly mark our situation with indications of the Divine Beneficence toward us. In such a state of things it is, in an especial manner, our duty as a people, with devout reverence and affectionate gratitude, to acknowledge our many and great obligations to Almighty God and to implore Him to continue and confirm the blessings we experience.

Deeply penetrated with this sentiment I George Washington President of the United States do recommend to all religious Societies and Denominations and to all persons whomsoever within the United States to set apart and observe Thursday the — day of February next as a day of public Thanksgiving and prayer, and on that day to meet together and render their sincere and hearty thanks to the great Ruler of Nations for the manifold and signal mercies which distinguish our lot as a Nation particularly for the possession of Constitutions of Government which unite and by their union establish Liberty with order, for the preservation of our peace foreign and domestic for the reasonable control which has been given to a spirit of disorder in the suppression of the late insurrection, and generally for the prosperous course of our affairs public and private, and at the same time humbly & and

PART OF PROCLAMATION ISSUED BY PRESIDENT WASHINGTON

First Observations

The Pilgrims celebrated Thanksgiving on December 13, 1621. This was the first celebration of this occasion. It was not a regularly observed festival until after the Revolution and the adoption of the Constitution. After the year 1789 it was customary to observe it. Thanksgiving day is a peculiarly American institution and is not observed elsewhere, except in Canada. Of course, days when the thanks of the nation are offered to God are observed from time to time in foreign countries, but this is done with no regularity.

TOO LUCKY

Married Woman—Ah, my husband has always been a lucky man. As a child he was thrown by a horse, but wasn't injured. As a youth the ice broke beneath him, but he wasn't drowned. As a young man he was caught in an Alpine avalanche, but escaped uninjured. . . .

Bachelor—And he has now been married 20 years and is still alive.—Tit-Bits.

PREHISTORIC ANCESTORS

Miss Wolfcub—Miss Clamshell says she's engaged.

Miss Bobcat—Well, she's not. That black eye she's showing is just make-up. She put it on with charcoal.

Artistic Egoism

The katydid a tune doth play
With melody precarious,
And values a hind leg, they say,
More than a Stradivarius.

On Exhibition

A man who had averted a great disaster by an act of heroism was complimented on his bravery.

One woman said: "I wish I could have seen your feat."

Whereupon he blushed and stammered, and finally, pointing downwards, said—

"Well, there they be, mum."

Tiresome Custom

Once there was a child who had her memory jogged again and again to say, "Thank you." When brother passed the candy she took a big piece, but she said not a word. "Say thank you!" commanded mother.

"Oh, dear me," she said in a bored tone. "I'm getting sick of this thank you business!"

A Modern Alibi

Dad (who doesn't smoke)—Helen, I smell cigarette smoke on your lips.

Daughter—I guess I got that from dancing mother.

A WARNING

Edwin—Do you believe that absence makes the heart grow fonder?

Angelina—Sometimes absence makes the heart grow fonder of the man who sticks right on the job.

Brass and Strings

A wreck may leave you all forlorn
Unless you're looking sharp,
Awhile you sound your motor horn
And next you play a harp.

Well Done

Grocer—My boy, if you want a thing well done you must do it yourself.

Boy—Then suppose you carry these crates down cellar, sir.

His Affliction

Hostess—You can't imagine how sad my husband's eyesight is getting. Only today he mistook me for the nursemaid.

Friend—And she's such a pretty girl, too.

Some Lad!

Clara—So George is in love with you! The poor fish!

Mae—Well, I wish he was a devilfish, so he'd have six more arms, that's all!

Despises Himself

"I would like to get your idea of a true statesman," said the chap with the notebook.

"Young man," replied the senator, "I am willing to give you an interview, but I haven't time to spare for a full biography."

Her Reason

"I can't understand why you want to divorce your husband. Everyone finds him charming!"

"Yes. That's why!"—Pathfinder.

About Thanksgiving Time

What a splendid world this is when all
The hills are green in May,
When the Bob White whistles his morning call,
And winter is far away;
When the wind makes music among the reeds
And blossoms are pink and white;
When the eager sprouts spring forth from the seeds
And the clouds are high and light;
When the trees and the hedges are full of song
And lovers drop into rhyme
—But—
It remains a pretty fair world along
About Thanksgiving time.

It's a splendid world to the fair June bride
And the hopeful graduate;
To the maid who stands at her lover's side
In the moonlight at the gate;
It's a splendid world when we sit and dream
In the shade of a friendly tree
And learn the song of a tinkling stream
That is seeking a far-off sea;
It's a splendid world when the lark's glad song
Makes the morning seem sublime
—But—
It remains a pretty fair world along
About Thanksgiving time.

Day Is Treasured Heirloom for All True Americans

Proclamations Not Needed to Turn Hearts to Giving Thanks for Mercies.

Thanksgiving day is at hand. The President of the most favored nation on the earth has issued his proclamation, and the governors of the various states, following his example, have told of the bountiful harvests and heaven's high favor. From our magistrates as well as from our hearts comes the command to be thankful for our great blessings.

But the hundred and odd millions of people in the United States do not need a reminder of the day or any official command to celebrate it. The spirit of the Pilgrim Fathers on the desolate coast of Cape Cod exists as an heirloom in the hearts of the American people. It is one of the first things that lay hold upon and graft themselves upon the character of the races that come from abroad to make the new world their home.

They may have little to be thankful for, yet the day becomes a festival, even if the purse be scanty and the larder be light. Three centuries have passed since the first Thanksgiving day was celebrated in America, and ever since it has been a day of blessing for rich and poor alike. It has been a day when those to whom the blessings of plenty have come have given thanks for their own plenteous store, while the unfortunate among God's people have rendered tearful thanks for the charity that remembers the poor.

Day of Rejoicing.

On Thanksgiving day the homes of those with fortune blessed in this great nation ring with the merry shout of children and the graver gayety of the old folks, while tables groaning under mammoth turkeys, set in celery and cranberry sauce, and glistening gravy, and spiced pickles and plum pudding, will subdue the appetites of the very hungriest.

In other homes not so elegant, but with contentment blessed, there will be turkey, also—with not so many "fixings," to be sure, but turkey, for all that, with white meat for happy mother and a wing for father, and the remaining wing and the drumstick amicably distributed among the children. The wishbone will be laid away above the parlor door to dry.

In this home, too, there will be guests—the friend from the country; the store friend, whose relatives are eating turkey far away; the homeless bachelor, who works with father in the shop, and has no one else with whom to eat turkey; the married son or daughter, with the wee grand-children, which makes mother feel that she is old, although no one else would think so to look at her.

Charitable Duties.

Then in homes still more humble, where turkey is still too great a luxury, a better bit of beef than usual will be set by, and a mince pie will afford delight to stomachs unaccustomed to other delicacies.

But there will be some to whom no Thanksgiving will come, except through the kindness of the charitable—children of the alleys, gaunt-eyed and already hopeless in their poverty, asking with mute anguish to be fed, and devouring greedily with their eyes the good things before the doors of the grocers and butchers; whole families shivering in the desolation of fireless homes. All these plead for the hand of help, and while the charitable societies will do much, each individual by themselves could do more.

So let us, who have reason to be thankful, seize the opportunity to show thankfulness by helping those who know not what it is to be grateful, having nothing to be grateful for. Let us not selfishly thank God for His mercies to us and remain ourselves unmerciful.

HARVEST

The earth has rolled around again and harvest time is here,
The glory of the seasons and the crown of all the year;
Let us voice our thanks and praises in a chorus of good cheer,
For it is Thanksgiving day.

For the early crops and later,
For the lesser fruits and greater,
All give thanks to our Creator,
For it is Thanksgiving day.

We've found the meaning of the word,
Giving day, Thanksgiving day.
By gratitude our hearts are stirred,
Giving day, Thanksgiving day.

Thanksgiving is our theme, you know,
And while our thanks to God we owe,
We owe our giving here below,
Giving day, Thanksgiving day.
—Carolyn Wells, in the Kansas City Star.

Imported Birds May Replace the Turkey

An experimental turkey farm has been established at Glendale, in the dry region of Arizona, by the United States Department of Agriculture to stimulate interest in turkey raising. The industry has declined greatly in the last 25 years. Scientific production methods are to be developed on this farm, and studies made of the turkey disease known as "blackhead," a mysterious malady which wipes out entire flocks.

In the event of failure of these experiments, other birds, which have been introduced from South America and Mexico, may ultimately replace the domestic turkey made famous as an offering of Thanksgiving by the early Pilgrims. One of these is the South American ocellated turkey, which has plumage like a peacock. Another is the chacalaca turkey from Mexico and Honduras.

The domesticated turkey is now heading toward extinction. Breeding stocks have decreased from 6,600,000 birds in 1900 to around 3,500,000. New England raises scarcely enough to meet local demands.

Farms in the East have grown them usually as sidelines, individual flocks rarely exceeding 100 turkeys. In parts of southern California turkeys are herded like sheep on the open range in flocks of 1,000 or more, tended by men on horseback.

LODGE NOTES

The Pythian Sisters, of this place, received many compliments on their manner, of entertaining the county convention last Wednesday. A fine chicken dinner was served in the basement of the Lutheran church to 90 ladies from this county, Fort Wayne and New Haven. The basement of the church and Castle Hall were beautifully decorated in the Pythian Sister colors, white, red, yellow and blue. After the regular routine of the Association meeting was finished the following program was given: "An Emergency Operation" by Dr. Bonnell Souder assisted by two other ladies from Auburn. For an encore Dr. Souder gave a reading from Guest.

A musical reading "The Bride and Groom" Mrs. Lena Meek.

Piano solo—Mrs. Edna Jackson-Perkins.

A fancy dance by little Miss Carma Jean Wilcox.

Several short talks were given by Grand Officers and most Excellent Chiefs of various Temples.

The next convention will be entertained at Waterloo.

The largest delegation from any one Temple was twenty ladies from Auburn.

SUNDAY MORNING WRECK ON WABASH

Seventeen persons narrowly escaped death or serious injury early Sunday morning when two sleeping coaches on Wabash train No. 2 slid down an 18-foot embankment near Butler. Ten were slightly hurt, on suffering a broken arm.

The accident occurred at 4 A. M. when all of the passengers of the two cars were in sleeping berths.

The eastbound flyer was three miles south of Butler, when one of the rails snapped, sending the two sleepers down the embankment and plunging the seventeen occupants into confusion in the chilly hours of morning.

Drs. Casperson and Fanning rushed first aid equipment to the scene of the accident.

Harry Gamble, coffee salesman, of Detroit, was the most seriously injured. He suffered a fracture of one arm two inches below the shoulder. He was taken to a hotel for medical attention, and later boarded the train for Detroit.

Eight or ten other passengers of the two ill-fated cars, suffered lacerations and scalp wounds. First aid was administered at the scene of the accident to these, and word was sent ahead to Detroit for ambulances to meet the train and take those injured to hospitals.

A third sleeper of the train was derailed, but remained upright. None of its occupants was injured. The fact that the two cars were made of steel is thought to have accounted for the small number of casualties. One of the two cars, however, was demolished, and has not been removed from the scene of the accident.

Two wreckers were called from Montpelier and Peru to clear up the wreckage and retrack the one car. One of the other cars was retracked later. Traffic was held up for two hours before the train continued to Detroit.

BOOSTING VS KNOCKING

Boosting is best in moderation. There can be such a thing as over-doing it. But never to our knowledge has there been too much of it in St. Joe or Spencerville. Sometimes a knock of the right kind is all right—if it serves the purpose of waking up the community to the point where it will start in boosting to overcome the knock. But always it takes more boosting than it takes knocking to improve conditions. So let's lay aside the hammer we've been hiding behind our backs and pick up a horn.

A CHECK AND KIND WORDS FROM NEWS READER

Fort Wayn, Ind., 11-19-'26
Fred B. Leighty,
Editor St. Joe News
Dear Fred:

Just want to tell you how much we appreciate "The News" since you have added the "New Linotype" and to congratulate you on giving a real Newsy Paper.

You certainly have made a great improvement both in looks and news items and you surely deserve the patronage of each and every resident of St. Joe. It is now a little more than nine years since we have been residents of St. Joe, but we never forget the Old Home Town, nor the many friends of other days. In a community like St. Joe there is only one way to build it up and that is by united effort of all the people. There are so many good things that could be said about St. Joe and her people that no one ever ought to give it a knock.

In your efforts for a better paper and a better St. Joe you have our best wishes for success.

Very Truly,
C. A. Patterson.
Please enclose find check.

Lester Curie of Tulsa, Okla., who is home for Thanksgiving says:—"Your paper shows marked improvement and wish to congratulate you on the class of paper you are giving St. Joe."

S. B. Dustman, Editor Masonic Tidings, Warsaw, says:—"Your paper has certainly made a fine improvement, since installing your new linotype."

WE WANT TO ASK DO YOU REMEMBER?

When Jake White lived in a house just west of the Wm. Hollabaugh residence?

When Alex Donaldson built and lived in the Dr. Bowman house and was the main Contractor and Carpenter of the town.

When Will Gee run a Barber Shop in a little house that is now a part of the George Wilson house and at that time stood where the G. M. Barney residence is?

When the Leighty Hotel was the main Hostelry of the town and a great rendezvous of the traveling men and Mother Leighty always served chicken for Wednesday dinner?

When in the fall of the year a string of farm wagons loaded with grain reached from the Elevator to the Leighty Store all waiting their turn to unload and Mahlon Baker was weighmaster?

When Jerry Irwin was the Town Constable?

When St. Joe had a coal oil fight between her merchants and oil sold as low as 4 cents per gallon?

When Dr. Mitchell had a Drug Store in a part of the building now occupied by Mrs. Warner as a Millinery Store and later owned by W. C. Patterson?

When the B. & O railroad run excursions every year to Rome City? Fare $1.00 for the round trip and any where from 100 to 200 people would go on them? "Hank Reynolds" Agent.

When a fellow from west Jackson township said he was going to start a Quart Shop in the old Washler saloon building, (now a part of the Central Grocery) and the men of St. Joe said he wasn't? Neither did he.

Parent-Teacher Association

Friday evening of this week, December 3rd, the Parent-Teacher Association desires to give you a treat by way of a special program. To do this your presence is necessary. We are pleased to announce that you will have an opportunity to hear Dr. Ada E. Schweitzer on the above mentioned date, Dr. Schweitzer is a well known authority on child health problems and all young mothers will find her lecture especially helpful.

The question is often asked "just what is the relation between the community at large and the Parent-Teacher Association?"

One of the resolutions passed at the last State convention is a direct answer and is as follows:

"We earnestly believe that adequate financial support of the public schools should come entirely from public funds raised by taxation.

We believe that Parent-Teacher Associations should supply funds for buying school equipment only in cases of extreme emergency. Therefore be it

Resolved that we pledge ourselves to the education of our members and of our communities in an adequate and equable system of taxation to meet all the needs of education."

Another resolution that is of particular interest to us at present, is:

"Dr. Ade E. Schweitzer has accepted appointment as chairman of the Parent-Teacher Committee on Child Health, and we recognize that Dr. Schweitzer is an outstanding authority in this field. Therefore be it resolved that the entire association carefully follow Dr. Schweitzer's leadership in Chld Health, both physical and mental."

All of the resolutions passed at the State convention will be read at the meeting Friday night and if you are interester in the aims of P.-T. A., be sure you are there to hear and understand.

HEALTH PROGRAM

The following splendid program will be given Friday night at the Parent-Teacher meeting, which has been changed from Dec. 17th, to Friday night, Dec. 3rd., when you will be afforded the privilege of hearing Dr. Ada E. Schweitzer, of Indianapolis.

Singing led by Miss Gallahan.

LICENSE LAW FOR HUNTERS EXPLAINED; FEW EXEMPT

The oft-asked question, "Who is required to possess a license to hunt lawfully in Indiana?" is answered by George N. Mannfeld, superintendent of the fish and game divison of the state conservation department.

Mannfeld pointed out that according to law every person, regardless of age, must have a license to hunt when not on his own premises. No license, he said, can be issued to a person less than fourteen years old, except with the consent of the parent or guardian. Residents who served in the United States armed forces and who possess an honorable discharge from that service, he said, need no license to hunt. It is only resident owners of land, their children living with them or their tenants and their children who are exempted from license to hunt on their own land.

SPECIAL DAY AT METHODIST CHURCH

Rev. McKnight, pastor of St. Joe M. P. Church, reports a very successful observance of Annual Conference day program, as required by the church, for the purpose of educating the members as to the denominational life and purposes. Special music was furnished by the choir and male quartette for the day. The pastor's subject for the morning was, "The Open Door." This was handled in a very able way, showing the opportunities of the church to carry out its commission when backed by the membership.

At the noon hour a basket dinner was served to a good crowd and justice was meeted every thing that was spread.

The afternoon program was of an inspirational and educational nature, songs and readings besides talks by laymen. Preachers Aid by O. E. Ginther and Church Extension and the Budget by R. W. Brodbeck.

The annual budget was $2.00 per member, and the committee reported approximately $90.00 subscribed, with other members to see.

In all, the day was well spent. A number of Concord members were present.

LITTLE GAMBLING IN DEKALB COUNTY

Capt. H. C. Springer Gives An Address on Law Enforcement

The DeKalb County Ministerial Association held its regular monthly meeting Monday morning in the assembly room of the Eckhart Public Library in Auburn. The largest attendance since the organization was formed was present. The Rev. P. A. Soerenson presided and the Rev. B. M. Beshdolt, Methodist minister in Garrett, had charge of the devotions.

The address of the morning was by Captain H. C. Springer of Butler, the prosecuting atterney for the DeKalb-Steuben circuit court. The speaker declared that the present methods of court procedure are archaic and that no speedy remedy for lawlessness is in sight until the jurisprudence of the country undergoes a radical reform. The early settlers in America were largely people fleeing from political persecution and constitutional provisions and legal enactments were made to protect the personal liberties of the individual. Today those safeguards are being used by the worst criminals to keep them from prosecution.

Mr. Springer favors a majority verdict in criminal cases rather than as at present, an unanimous decision. He favors the reforms now being urged by the Amercan Bar Association which will cut out the long delays of justice, the red-tape of the courts, the harking back to out-of-date precedents. He said it required a hundred years in England to modernize her courts and that the outlook is hopeful that such changes will begin to come in the United States before many years.

Speaking of conditions locally he said there had been a noticeable decline in gambling in DeKalb county the last five years due to the tightenng up of officials on the places where gambling existed. Due to the inevitable prison sentence that has followed the breaking of the liquer laws, bootlegging has been practically curtailed. It has been impossible to wipe it entirely out due to border conditions about the two counties represented by this judicial circuit. Referring to Sunday observance Mr. Springer said our Sunday law was passed when present conditions were unknown and he appealed to the ministry to lift up public sentiment so that all laws might be the more easily enforced.

The secretary of the Association was asked to convey to Captain Springer the unanimous gratitude of the meeting for his splendid address. Rev. W. M. Elliott of Garrett, chairman of the committee on better co-operation with the DeKalb County Council of Religious Education Association, reported that his committee held a meeting wth the officers of the Association and found them to be in hearty accord for coordination of the work of the two bodies. It was ordered that hereafter the president of the ministerial society attend the meetings of the educational association and that when matters pertaining to the latter body are before the preachers that the president of the Sunday School workers be asked to enjoy the privileges of the floor.

That there may be uniformity hereafter all old and new members will be asked to pay their dues at the meeting in January. Rev. D. E. Duncan, new Baptist minister at Garrett, Rev. K. W. Matthews, new Baptist pastor in Auburn, Rev. David Smith, a local preacher of Auburn, and Rev. Sample, visiting Methodist Protestant minister of Harlan, were introduced.

The chair appointed Revs. I. C. Boyts, G. H. Trinkle and A. A. Irelan a committee on nomination of officers for the new year. The report of this committee was adopted electing Rev. G. F. Hubbartt of Auburn, as president, Rev. W. M. Elliott of Garrett, vice president and Rev. J. E. Poer of Corunna, as secretary-treasurer.

Queen Marie Meets Fellow Countryman at Gary

When Queen Marie visited the steel mills at Gary, Ind., the workers seemed rather indifferent to her presence until she called out: "Are there any Rumanians here?" Robert Ariet, a young craneman, responded, stepped forward and had a pleasant chat with her majesty, and the incident relieved the occasion of all its stiffness. Above the queen is seen talking with Ariet.

World's Largest Motor-Generator Locomotive

The world's largest motor-generator locomotive, a giant capable of hauling 200-car trains, and representing what engineers say is one of the outstanding achievements in electric traction history, has just been taken from the East Pittsburgh works of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing company to the Pacific coast and delivered to the Great Northern railway for operation in mountain service over the Cascade mountain grade in the state of Washington. It will be used on all trains operating on the electrified division of the road, this involving one of the longest and steepest mountain grades in America. Having transformers and motor-generators included as part of its electric equipment, the locomotive utilizes high-voltage alternating current on the trolley to drive direct-current traction motors, thus providing the highest efficiency from the standpoint of electric transmission and motor drive.

Ax Has Replaced the Tomahawk

Indians who lived in the wild turkey regions of the United States might have used the tomahawk to chop off the birds' heads, but the Blackfeet tribe of the Glacier National park reservation never feasted on turkey until recent years when they took to farming. They now find the ax a handier weapon for the beheading of the "turk."

Prize Pig Brings Record Price

The highest price ever paid in the world for pork was paid to Henry Roninger, nineteen years old, of Pelican Rapids, Minn., when his prize-winning Duroc Jersey was sold at auction for $1.25 a pound, or a total of $427.50. The porker was awarded the grand championship at the Junior Live-Stock show held at South St. Paul.

DOLMAN STYLED EVENING WRAPS; CLOTH COATS CLAIM SMART MODE

ONCE upon a time a beautiful queen there was clad in gorgeous raiment—no longer a fairy story of childish fancy, for a really and truly lovely daughter of royalty is paying our America a visit. And the clothes she wears!

If there are garments more regal than another in the resplendent wardrobe of our royal visitor, Queen Marie of Rumania, they are her majesty's wraps. Upon the arrival of this fair guest she wore a wine-colored velvet coat trimmed with dark-brown fox. At a formal function given later in her honor the queen was enwrapped in a mantle of cloth of gold bordered with sable.

Another one of this gracious lady's wraps is a Patou coat of sapphire-blue chiffon velvet bloused at the back and lavishly trimmed with blue fox. And yet another of royalty's gorgeous wraps is a taupe-colored velvet heavily garnitured with moleskin—which all goes to show that wraps, especially evening wraps, are wondrously elaborate this season. Also it is an accepted fact that velvet is a favorite medium for the dressy coat.

At opera and formal occasions our American queens of society are expressing a preference for sumptuous wraps either of rarely beautiful brocade or velvet or all-fur.

When of velvet the preferred styling is that of the dolman of which the model here pictured is a representative type. Often magnificent fur or ostrich is the sole embellishment of the glowingly colorful velvet wrap, but just as often the velvet is encrusted with a heavy embroidery as novel and elaborate as that shown in this picture. This beautiful wrap among the winter collection of Maison Delaittre is of raspberry-red velvet, with embroidery to match. It is enriched with a huge collar of gray fox.

In full soft lines is an evening coat of emerald-green velvet, created by Agnes, the collar, sleeves and yoke displaying much shirring but distinguished by an absence of fur. Thus is the supremacy of velvet for the evening wrap accented by leading French creators of the mode.

To be sure, it is a woman's privilege to change her mind, but what if she refuses to do so? In two instances at least she is expressing this season the courage of her convictions, namely the "bob" and the slender silhouette. If style promoters are trying to persuade femininity to abandon these popular modes so far their efforts have been futile. As every barber knows, likewise beauty specialists, the bob still flourishes. As for straight-line effects, notwithstanding the attempt of renowned Parisian couturiers to launch the dolman lines women of smart fashion continue to buy and to wear the narrow wrappy type of coats for daytime wear. That is, most of them do and the "majority rules."

There is one point, however, on which everybody agrees and that is rich fur trims. Scarcely a winter cloth coat but what shows some sort of fur embellishment. It may be only collar and cuffs of fur, such as so handsomely trim the coat in the picture, but even so, in every instance there is a beauty and a showiness about them which challenges the all-fur wrap to beware of its fur-trimmed cloth coat competitor.

A Regal Evening Wrap.

As to materials for our winter coats here is where the fair sex begins to waver between luxurious deep-pile fabrics and the recently exploited suedelike weaves. Very select is the coat of black suede cloth trimmed in elegant black lynx or wolf.

Many there are who elect to adopt the neck-to-hem fur revers. Competing with this mode is the deep shawl collar of fur. Novel fur cuffs and pockets distinguish the cloth coat also.

As to color there is a growing interest displayed in dark lovely blues, grackle being a favorite shade. Forest greens are also in smart vogue, likewise various red tones. While beige is of paramount importance a select clientele is also calling for silver and platinum grays.

Regarding the slenderised silhouette, notice in the model in the picture that the front lap is diagonal. This is a late development in coat styling.

"Malthusian" Theory

Thomas Robert Malthus, born 1766, was an English economist interested in social problems and study of population. In 1798 he published a book, "Essay on the Principles of Population as It Affects the Future Improvement of Society." This book demonstrated the theory that in all time population has tended to outrun subsistence, leading to the decay of the nation. He enlarged this theory in 1803 to demonstrate the impossibility of evading poverty and suffering among the mass of the people if unrestricted increase in population continued.

Drink Water to Help Wash Out Kidney Poison

If Your Back Hurts or Bladder Bothers You, Begin Taking Salts

When your kidneys hurt and your back feels sore don't get scared and proceed to load your stomach with a lot of drugs that excite the kidneys and irritate the entire urinary tract. Keep your kidneys clean like you keep your bowels clean, by flushing them with a mild, harmless salts which helps to remove the body's urinous waste and stimulates them to their normal activity. The function of the kidneys is to filter the blood. In 24 hours they strain from it 500 grains of acid and waste, so we can readily understand the vital importance of keeping the kidneys active.

Drink lots of good water—you can't drink too much; also get from any pharmacist about four ounces of Jad Salts; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast each morning for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate clogged kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they are no longer a source of irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone should take now and then to help keep their kidneys clean and active. Try this; also keep up the water drinking, and no doubt you will wonder what became of your kidney trouble and backache.

"When I got here he was at the wheel. I was sure then. I shouted at him and he paid no attention. I could hear the water pounding down into the tunnel and I tried to drag him away. I did once and tried to twist back the wheel but he jumped at me and we fought. He was too strong for me and he flung me off at last. He was crazy, beside himself, a madman. It wasn't just the liquor. 'I'm going to drown him,' he said. 'Drown him like a rat.' And he cursed at me first and then—threatened me.

"I was desperate. I saw a wrench on the seat and I struck him with it on the back of his head. He went down, staggering—and I got to the wheel. When the roar of the water ended I knew you were safe. I suppose I fainted. You came. . . ."

For the pair of them, for the moment, as their eyes met, there was no one else in the gatehouse. Burns stooped to the floor and picked up a tool.

"There's blood on the wrench," he said, under his breath to Cox. "Hey, where's that Mexican going?"

"It must have been Baxter I glimpsed as I came out of the shaft," Caleb was saying. "He had just come to, I suppose, and . . ."

He broke off at Burns' exclamation. The superintendent pointed to where Padilla was running over the plain toward the foothills, head low, eyes searching the ground, like a hound on trail. Something glittered in his hand.

"He's after Baxter," cried Caleb. "He'll kill him. I've got to stop that. Mrs. Carquinez, you'll go with Miss Clinton and Maria to El Nido. I'll get there later. I've got to prevent Padilla committing murder. You won't need me, Cox, go ahead without me."

He sprang through the door, hatless, his wet clothes clinging to limbs and body, starting out to run down Padilla before the avenging Mexican closed with his quarry. That the Mexican would be implacable, deaf and dumb and blind to all but his vengeance against the man who had injured la senorita, Caleb knew. Nevertheless Padilla must be stopped from crime and the penalty. He thought more of this than of Baxter as he followed the dusty trail across the plain that led straight toward a wooded arroyo.

Padilla was nearly halfway to the foothills before Caleb started but he gradually overhauled the Mexican. He was furious enough, remembering Betty's white skin with the bruises on it, her torn garments, to beat Baxter to a pulp. Baxter, he realised, must have overheard Feely's report to Burns and seized his chance to get even with Caleb.

The thought of Betty swift to his rescue, her intuition quickened, surely by some tie between them, of Betty fighting with the drunken, crazy Baxter, beating him down with the wrench, was glorious to him in proportion to his rage. The only thing that curbed his own anger from the Mexican's intent to kill was, perhaps, the sight of the knife in Padilla's hand, the sudden knowledge of what penalty the Mexican would have to pay for murder, of Maria and Betty's sorrow. But he was not going to let Baxter off scot-free if he got at him. Only the one thought beat against the wrath that exulted already at the idea of getting Baxter within reach of his hands, the remembrance that punishment must stop short of murder. There his New England sanity fought for restraint. He had won Betty—he must not lose her.

A little stream sometimes babbled down the arroyo where Padilla, a hundred yards ahead of Caleb still, disappeared in a jungle of buckeye and manzanita. Footprints of them both were plain in the still moist earth for a few paces and then abruptly disappeared. Baxter had taken to the sidehill and the thicker undergrowth. Caleb halted perplexed. He had little breath left for the call to Padilla, he felt it was useless before he uttered it.

He stood alert, listening. To his right, and ahead, there sounded a sharp crack of dry twigs and he started off again, buffeting his way through low boughs and brambles.

He was certain that Baxter could not elude Padilla. For years the Mexican had guarded his senorita under the vow taken by him and Maria, that had held back their own happiness and added fuel to a slowly growing hate that, now the time had come, would give deep knife wounds in exchange for the bruises of his mistress. Unless Caleb could come up with him Baxter was as good as dead.

A shrill cry of agony sounded from the dense growth of the arroyo, not far away, toward the head of the cleft.

For a second Caleb stood still, chilled by the crawling horror of that shriek, the cry of a coward facing death. It was not repeated. There was no sound at all in the hot gulch where no leaf stirred.

Then he heard an exclamation in Spanish—"Reina Sanctissima!"—and plunged ahead through the tangle to come out in a tiny clearing.

A live oak grew by a slab of gray rock on which, as on some savage altar, lay Baxter, the sunlight drifting down through the gnarled boughs of the tree and gilding a face the color of clay, a dropped jaw that showed the white teeth amid the untrimmed beard, eyes rolled up, already glazing, the face in a snarl, inhuman. Bending above him, shrinking back a little with his knife upraised, stood Padilla. He seemed to have recoiled from his deed, while ready to deliver a second blow.

Caleb leaped and caught the wrist of the hand that held the blade. Padilla turned to him a face that was hard to read. There was disappointment in it, slow-dying fury—and awe.

"Senor," he said. "I did not touch heem! See, my knife is clean. There is no blood upon eet. I did not touch heem! Sangre di Cristo, he hear me comin', he run weeth his head on his shoulder an', all of a sudden he put his han' to his side, he cry out, twist roun' an' fall like you see. When I reach heem he is muerte! Dead! Because he is too much afraid."

Caleb loosened Baxter's collar and shirt, slipped his hand in over the heart.

"He is dead, senor—I mean to keel him myself. But eet is the judgment of God."

Caleb knew that it was the "champagne heart" of Baxter, too long abused, the overtaxed engine of a misused machine, that had given way at last. Fright had helped, no doubt;

"Eet is the Face of a Devil—el Aspecto del Demonio."

the wild, pounding, panting run with the knowledge of Padilla swift and relentless upon him with lifted and glittering knife. Baxter had burned out. But he did not attempt to modify the Mexican's statement. He put his own handkerchief over the face. It was horrible—terrible! There was none of the oft-quoted "peace of death" upon it. The eyes stared, glassy and wild. The livid lips were drawn back to show the teeth and the snarl that made the features so frightfully bestial. It was as if the soul of Baxter had departed utterly when he had turned the wheel of the water-gallery with murder in his heart and now, only the brute that dwelled in the subconscious was revealed—in full. A dead, mad face. Doctor Fields' theory had awful testimony here.

All hate died out in Caleb. Here was a mad dog—dead. An atavism, self-produced and self-annihilated.

"I should hav' like to keel him," said Padilla. "An' you, senor, would you hav' only talk to heem? I weel stay here until you come back. Perhaps you weel better send the sheriff an' see la senorita, to tell her the man who hurt her is muerte. It is better I wait here for the sheriff. Also . . ."

He pointed upwards. High in the blue, swinging in circles that gradually narrowed above the arroyo, soared a buzzard. Even while they looked another appeared—another.

"They are queek," said Padilla. "Soon there weel be more. The sheriff mus' not find heem disturb'."

The Mexican crossed himself.

"You saw his face, senor," he said in a low voice—as if the dead could hear. "Sangre di Cristo! Eet is the face of a devil—el aspecto del demonio."

CHAPTER XVII

Dios Bendiga a Vd.

A week later Caleb sat with Betty in the twilight on the broad mission bench in the patio at El Nido. In the big room Stella Carquinez was at the piano, playing softly. Carquinez himself had been forced to go to Golden to discuss a commission. Their child had gone to bed. Maria was softly crooning a lullaby at the far end of the patio garden, putting Mary Morgan's baby—of which she had not been ashamed—to sleep.

Caleb and Betty were silent. He was trying to find words for what he wanted to tell her in fitting language, and finding it difficult. His emotions confounded him in this supreme issue. The nearness of her, the consciousness that to gain her was everything, to lose her meant all the joy taken out of success and life, now and to come, set his heart pounding till he thought that she must surely hear it, sapped his confidence.

"Betty," he said at last, "you saved my life. What do you want to do with it?"

She did not affect to misunderstand him. He had known she would not do that. There was something established between them, a bond that had made their silence filled with magnetism. Caleb hoped that it was love, with her, as it was with him. As he sat, hands on knees, leaning toward her in the dusk, trying to read her face, he felt his fingers trembling. Every atom of him longed for her, reached out for her in an ardor that seemed to belong to another Caleb Warner, lately created.

"What do you want me to do with it?" she asked.

"Share it, Betty. All ways and always."

"All ways?" She had risen, standing by one of the posts of the pergola, jasmine wreathed. Now he stood opposite to her, close and looking down at her upturned face. The curves of her mouth maddened him. He clenched his hands until his nails stung his flesh, hanging on to himself, restraining a desire to woo her only with kisses. His reason fought with his passion. He knew Betty Clinton was not to be won that way alone. Something ran riot in his veins, infecting his being. There was no congealed blood there, for all of Baxter's sneer. And it affected the girl. He could see her sway a little and he suddenly caught her in his arms.

"Yes, all ways, Betty. Lover and mate and partner in everything. You are the other half of me. To share in all things, joy and sorrow, love and work. Love first, Betty, and then we'll go on together with the work that will be ours, planned together, done together—and so to love again."

She had not resisted him. Her head had lain against his shoulder. She lifted it, searching his face. Then, even in the dusk, he saw hers become softly radiant, as, satisfied, she raised her lips to his, her body, soft and infinitely human, clinging close to his. And, for a time, he knew that she was not lacking in the passion that had possessed him.

"We shall go on together," she said softly—after quite a while—"always on and on, Caleb. Bringing water to thirsty places and to thirsty people? Blending work with love to make all perfect? Anything else would only mean stagnation in the end."

"I am the Water-Bearer," he said—he was a little inclined to vaunt in his triumph. "You remember the sign of Aquarius?"

"You must give me mine back again."

"I shall. The two fishes, joined together with a ribbon. Water-creatures, Betty. You and I, in the same element, bound by love."

The music within became louder, ended in a crash of chords. Stella Carquinez came to the patio entrance.

"What are you two doing? Mooning in the dark?" she queried. "Oh!" she added softly. "Honeymooning! I am so glad—my dears. Where are you going, Betty?"

"I am going to tell Maria," she said as she swiftly passed them. Caleb saw tears on her face as she went through the door. He knew they were tears of happiness.

"You are lucky, but tardy," Mrs. Carquinez said to Caleb. "I don't know that you deserve her. You disappointed me last month, at our little celebration."

"I wanted to finish my work," said Caleb simply.

Stella Carquinez laughed softly.

"Dios! Once a Yankee always a Yankee! But you're well mated. Betty—here she comes with Maria, after all."

"Senor," said Maria, stately for all her weight, "It is very well. You will make my senorita happy an' she, ah senor, the good God is very kind to you! An' now I am to make Luis happy, my senorita says. He needs some one to look after heem, for he is only a great child. We shall throw away those two rugs of the puma skeen. My knees have worn off the hair. But we shall still pray—for two now—perhaps, manana, for more. Quien sabe? Now she hav' some one to protect, I," she broke off into a torrent of Spanish, stooped, caught both their hands and kissed them, vanished into the garden.

"She sets an excellent example," said Mrs. Carquinez. "Adios y buenos noches! Dios bendiga a Vd," she added softly at the door.

But they did not hear her benediction. They were quite alone before Elsie Carquinez had left the room.

Lesson for December 5

RUTH AND NAOMI

LESSON TEXT—Ruth 1:14-22.

GOLDEN TEXT—Thy people shall be my people and thy God my God.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Story of Ruth.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Ruth a Loyal Daughter.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Ruth the Loyal.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—The Message of the Book of Ruth.

In order to grasp the matter contained in the lesson subject, there must be swept into view the whole book of Ruth. The lesson text which is to be printed has been confined to the first chapter, verses 14-22.

I. Ruth's Connection With Naomi (1:1-15).

On account of famine in Bethlehem of Judah, Naomi with her husband and two sons sojourned in the land of Moab. After the death of her husband her two sons married Moabitish women. After a time her sons died also. After the death of her sons Naomi resolved to return to her homeland, having heard that the Lord had visited his people in giving them bread. They went to Moab to escape trouble but only got into more. It was not until Naomi was thus chastised that she resolved to return. One purpose of God's chastisement is to cause His children to return. Naomi had the good sense to recognize that the hand of the Lord was upon her for good. When the time came for her to go, Ruth and Orpah accompanied her for a distance. This she permitted but determined to place before them frankly the difficulties which would necessarily confront them.

II. Ruth's Noble Choice (1:16-18).

Much as Naomi loved her daughters-in-law, she would not have them go into this matter blindly. She wished them to know the seriousness of their undertaking. She told them the worst that could come upon them. This principle ought to be carried out by us in all our relations in life. In this respect Jesus is our supreme example.

1. No chance to marry again. Naomi told her that she had no more sons for whom she could wait. In that day to be unmarried was the greatest disgrace. Society differed then from now. No avenues were left open by which a woman could earn her living and be independent. Furthermore, it was against God's law for the Jews to marry outside of their own people.

2. She must renounce her gods. Her idolatrous worship could not be carried on in the land where God's people dwelt. This was delicately touched upon when Orpah went back (v. 15). Orpah went back when it was plain there was no chance to get a husband. Now Naomi puts an additional test upon Ruth, that of giving up her religion. Ruth was equal to the occasion. Her mind was fully made up. She was willing to accept as her God the one who was able to produce in His subjects the nobility of character she had observed in Naomi. Naomi's very frankness in dealing with her caused Ruth to be more determined to cast her lot with her. Ruth's position was so definite and unfaltering that the very expressions have come down to us in words which "no poetry has outrivaled, and no pathos has exceeded, and which have gone through centuries with the music that will not let them be forgotten." She was determined to share Naomi's journey, her home, her God, her lot in life, and her grave.

III. Blessings Which Attended Ruth's Faithfulness.

Ruth was never sorry for her choice, because:

1. She found the true God (1:16).

Instead of her heathen god who was unable to help her, she now had the living God, the God of Israel.

2. She found human friends (ch. 2).

As she went to glean in the field she was led to the field of Boaz, a man of wealth and grace. The servants of Boaz treated her with consideration.

3. A good husband and a happy home (chs. 3, 4).

She not only secured a husband, but a man of God who had an abundance of this world's goods.

4. An honored place in the Israelitish nation (4:13-17).

Though she had to forsake her own people she became one of a nobler people.

5. She became a link in the chain of Christ's ancestry (4:18-22; cf. Matt. 1:5).

The one who fully decides for Christ and gives up all for Him shall gain a hundredfold in this life, and in the world to come eternal life.

Depend on God

Remember that nothing can ever harm you when you have given your life into the keeping of God. Man is powerless against Him who is fortified of the Almighty. You are a child of God—immune, secure.—R. J. Campbell.

Jesus' Achievements

One is sure that a great deal that Jesus achieved He achieved because He was able to give this deathless hope to the hearts of those to whom He spoke.—Robert E. Speer.

EXPERIENCE OF WESTERN GIRL

Found Cannery Work Too Tiring

The fertile valleys of Oregon help to supply the tables of America. This is possible through the magic of the humble tin can.

In one of the canning establishments, Julia Schmidt was employed. It was complicated work because she did sealing and other parts of the work. It was strenuous work and she was not a strong girl. Often she forced herself to work when she was hardly able to sit at her machine. At times she would have to stay at home for she was so weak she could hardly walk. For five years she was in this weakened condition.

She tried various medicines. At last, a friend of hers spoke of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and she gave it a trial.

"Everyone says I am a healthier and stronger girl," she writes. "I am recommending the Vegetable Compound to all my friends who tell me how they suffer and I am willing to answer letters from women asking about it." Julia Schmidt's address is 652 North Front St., Salem, Oregon.

Girls who work in factories know just how Miss Schmidt felt. Perhaps they, too, will find better health by taking the Vegetable Compound.

Value of Reiteration

We simply cannot resist printing this extract from G. B. Shaw's speech on his seventieth birthday:

"For years past, with unprecedented pertinacity and abstination, I have been dinning into the public head that I am an extraordinary witty, brilliant and clever man. That is now part of the public opinion of England, and no power on earth will ever change it. I may dodder and dote, I may potboil and platitudinize, I may become the butt and the chopping-block of the rising generation, but my reputation shall not suffer; it is built up, fast and solid, like Shakespeare's on the impregnable basis of dogmatic reiteration."—Boston Transcript.

Watch Elimination!

Good Health Depends Upon Good Elimination.

RETENTION of bodily waste in the blood is called a "toxic condition." This often gives rise to a dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches and headaches. That the kidneys are not functioning properly is often shown by burning or scanty passage of secretions. Thousands have learned to assist their kidneys by drinking plenty of pure water and the occasional use of a stimulant diuretic. 50,000 users give Doan's signed endorsement. Ask your neighbor!

Be Happy Today

BY O. LAWRENCE HAWTHORNE

'Tain't alone the daily pleasures
That makes livin' wo'th the while,
'Tain't jus' fun that makes us happy
An' shows people how to smile.
No, folks wouldn't like the sunshine
Half so much without some rain,
An' we prize good fortune better
If we've had a share o' pain.

It's the little disappointments—
Yes, an' greater problems, too—
That we all must learn is helpful!
Looks to me like when folks do
What they know is right, an' frien'ly
To somebuddy else, they find
That the day has brought 'em gladness
An' they leave its cares behind.

HUNTING DANGERS LESSENED WHEN CAREFUL

Despite the fact that newspapers have for years been publishing warnings to hunters, accidents are plentiful enough over the country to warrant the belief that with many these warnings go in one ear and out the other. It takes more than a warning to make some people understand that no matter how skilled they may be in handling firearms, accidents can happen to them the same as to anyone else.

We read recently of a young man who had hunted regularly each season for years without meeting with an accident. On returning home a short time ago he stepped from his auto and in lifting his gun out of the car it was accidently discharged, the load striking him in the breast and killing him instantly. Other examples of peculiar accidents could be cited closer home.

The best hunters around St. Joe will tell you that it is impossible to use too much care in handling firearms. They will warn against pulling a shotgun through a fence, or pushing one's way through underbrush or high weeds while the trigger of the gun is unprotected. They know all there is to know about handling firearms, and the young man just starting in to hunt can do no better thing than to sit down and talk to one of these experienced hunters—and remember every word of caution he utters. Hunting is a great sport. It is a healthful one. There is no question about that. But it is not without its dangerous side, and accidents always happen in the very way that you least expect them to.

BE SOMETHING! DO SOMETHING

We must be something in order to do something, but we must also do something in order to be something. The best rule, I think, is this: If we find it hard to do good, then let us try to be good. If, on the other hand, we find it hard to be good, then let us try to do good. Being leads to doing, doing leads to being. Yet below both as their common root is faith,—faith in God, in man, in ourselves, in the eternal superiority of right over wrong, truth over error, good over evil, love over all selfishness and all sin.—J. F. Clarke.

1926 Again Chevrolet's Greatest Year

In 1925 Chevrolet astonished the automotive world by attaining an annual production never before reached by any manufacturer of gearshift automobiles.

Thus, for two years in succession, Chevrolet has broken all its previous records and has set a new mark in automotive history.

This splendid achievement results from a steadfast adherence to the fundamental Chevrolet policy of building a car of the finest possible quality to sell at a low price.

That the vast majority of buyers now demand a car of this type—and that Chevrolet has been successful in building such a car—possessing the highest degree of smooth performance, smart appearance, and economical operation—is proved by Chevrolet's success during the year now drawing to a close.

Dreams and Action

The Man With Three Names

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Most men are dreamers, more or less, but some have the ability to translate their dreams into action. These are the ones who achieve. Here is the highly interesting tale of a dreamer who saw immense practicality behind his visions and proceeded to put it into effect. One of his methods was to make enemies where prudence would have dictated the making of friends. Mad, impractical, worse than tilting at windmills it seemed, but note the results.

STRANGER PLAYS GOOD FELLOW AND WINS

A smooth stranger, well educated and with an intimate knowledge of baseball, football and basketball stars all over the country, victimized a number of Auburn people Wednesday and left with his booty for parts unknown.

His acquaintanceship with members of the baseball profession led him to seek Rollie Zeider first. He made his headquarters at the Zeider Billiard Academy and then extended his acquaintance with those interested in other sports.

He gave his name as "Duke" Holsenbeck and his residence as Toledo. While staying at Mr. Zeider's place he made himself handy and the night before Thanksgiving Mr. Zeider left him have the keys to the billiard room to open the place Thanksgiving morning.

Later in the day when Mr. Zeider arrived about $57 in cash had been taken, also some cigarettes and other stock. The "Duke" flimmed Joe Congor, proprietor of Joe's restaurant out of about $12, Frank Salon out of some shoes and furnishings and left town with a $45 suit and a $30 top coat belonging to Vernon Wiseman, which he borrowed from him ostensibly to go to Fort Wayne to meet a relative.

Sheriff W. G. Morr has been given a description of the man and has gotten in touch with Toledo authorities in an effort to locate him.

THE NECKTIE BUSINESS

The mails are flooded with the necktie business. Pawnee Bill or some other fellow sends you three neckties valued at about ten cents each and asks you to send a dollor for them. Many of the ties have come to patrons of the South Whitley postoffice. Many people have sent their dollar and for this expenditure they have abount 30 cents worth of merchandise. Others returned them and still others kept them and did not send the dollar.

A bill was introduced in the last congress to prohibit this practice, but the bill was killed for the reason that the person who receives the merchandise is not held responsible for the return nor for the payment of the merchandise.

The recipient, if he pays for or returns the ties, is the loser any way you can fix it. If he pays for them he has about 30 cents worth of merchandise for his dollar. If he sends them back, he has had to bother with something for which he gets no return.

The sending of unordered goods should be prohibited, but as we have no law of this kind for the protection of postoffice patrons, about the only way to correct the evil is to keep the stuff without paying for it, thus making it so unprofitable to the sender that he will have to discontinue business. If it hurts your conscience to do this, do as you please, but the evil should be corrected and you shoud buy your ties for somewhere near their real value.—South Whitley Tribune.

St. Joe, Spencerville and practically every postoffice in the state received a similar shipment. While there seemed to be a blind man supposed to be responsible for the sending, yet it is only a graft and is not worthy of consideration.

SPENCERVILLE LOSES TO ASHLEY

Bowser Plays Hard Game As Team Mates Drop Hard Battle

Grades Win Game

Spencerville, Nov. 29.—In a fast game that started with a bang when G. Meyers caged the ball in the first minute of play, Ashley high school won its basket ball game from Spencerville 24-18. Ashley presented one of the scrapiest teams that has appeared here this season and were leading by a score of 12-5 at the half.

Bowser played a hard game but his team-mates did not average up to their usual form and failed to support Gale in his efforts.

The Spencerville grades defeated the Ashley grades in a one sided affair 23-3. The local boys took an early lead and the outcome of the game was never in doubt.

The high school plays at Corunna next week.

Ducks Live in Chimney

At Pinehurst inn, Victoria Beach, near Winnipeg, Canada, a pair of ducks have a nest in a fireplace chimney. On several occasions in the morning, after a fire had been burning the evening before, the ducks were rescued from behind the fire screen, where, during the night, they had fallen, apparently overcome by smoke. They were released out of doors, but in a short time were back in their nest in the wide chimney.

The Man With Three Names

By HAROLD MACGRATH

The story of a man to whom fate had dealt marked cards and cheated abominably, then, apparently relenting, had given him a single chance to stack them in his own favor. How he took the chance, what he made of it, and how strangely it all affected the lives of many others! That is the story which Mr. Mac Grath tells in his usual engaging manner.

Do You Know This Liniment and Salve?

Time-Tried Home Remedies That Have Many Friends in This Neighborhood.

Porter's Pain King is known and used in many homes hereabouts. This old reliable liniment has been making friends since 1871, and the directions wrapped around every bottle tell how to use it for colds, aches and pains, soreness, swollen joints, strained muscles and rheumatic twinges. It seldom fails to drive out the pain.

The Salve is made of the same pure drugs and herbs that go into the liniment and is named Porter's Pain King Salve. Its base is lanoline (pure wool fat), in itself wonderfully healing and soothing. Porter's Pain King Salve is recommended for burns, cuts, bruises, sores, wounds, chapped and cracked skin, boils, felons, itch, colds on the chest, croup, lumbago, varicose veins and piles. Made and guaranteed by The Geo. H. Rundle Co., Piqua, O. It is said Porter's Pain King, the liniment, and Porter's Pain King Salve can be found in four of every five homes in this county. How many know all their many uses? Why not read the directions today?

DODD'S PILLS

DIURETIC STIMULANT TO THE KIDNEYS

Standard for Generations

This letter of gratitude from Philip Miller, Judge of Gray County, Cimmaron, Kan., a well-known Kansas judge, brings a message of hope to all heart and kidney sufferers.

"I took about six boxes of Dodd's Pills for heart trouble, from which I had suffered for five years. I had dizzy spells, puffed eyes, short breath, chills and backache. Am now 63 years old, well and hearty, able to do lots of manual labor, and weigh about 205 pounds. I feel very grateful that I used Dodd's Pills."

Varieties of Jinxes

The natives of Galway consider the fox unlucky. If they meet a fox on their way to fish, they turn back for that day. If Irishmen or Italians pronounce the names of certain animals while they are fishing they are certain to have ill luck. In some sections of Scotland there are old women whose names are unlucky and such persons must be spoken of in an indirect way.

Bringing up Children

"MY sisters, my sister-in-law and myself all have families, and for years we have all given our children Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. We have recommended it hundreds of times and think it just wonderful, not only to bring up children but for ourselves. At the slightest sign of stomach trouble, colds, constipation and when out of sorts, a dose or two is all they need. Truly, it is a family medicine and the stitch in time that saves nine." (Name and address sent on request.)

Constipation, Colds, Coughs, Fevers and Other Perils of Childhood

One dose and mother's anxiety is lifted. The sickest stomach craves the taste of Syrup Pepsin. From infancy to old age the result is certain. Droopy, listless, feverish children respond as if to magic. Headache, stomachache, biliousness, coated tongue, constipation—these are the daily perils for which a host of mothers say Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the safeguard. Sold and recommended by all druggists.

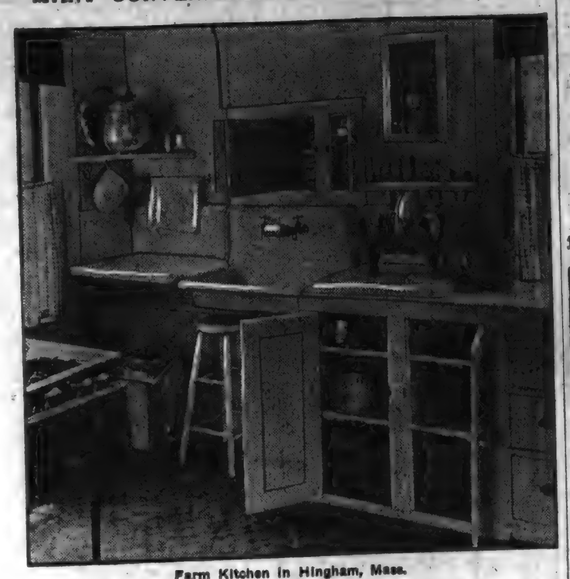
MANY CONVENIENCES IN SIMPLE KITCHEN



Farm Kitchen in Hingham, Mass.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Something noted in a neighbor's kitchen may be just the solution of the problem of arrangement that has bothered you for days. Here is a glimpse of a kitchen where many hints may be gleaned. This farm kitchen in Hingham, Mass., was transformed with the advice and assistance of the extension agent, into a workshop of unusual convenience. The photograph was taken by the United States Department of Agriculture.

All Space Utilized.

All the space between the two windows, which give both light and cross ventilation, has been utilized. The sink has double drain boards, always desirable, and above it, in addition to the corner shelf for the ever-needed drinking glass, is a cupboard for cleaning materials. Doors shut these out of sight when not in use. The handy rack for knives above the right-hand drain board keeps their edges sharp, and they can be put into it as soon as they are dried. The dish drainer is homemade. Very satisfactory wire drain baskets can be bought, however, for a moderate sum.

Places for Utensils.

Capacious drawers under the work counter which extends in front of the window provide places for small utensils, kitchen towels, aprons and other articles. Other kitchen tools hang on hooks on each side of the window. Note the special conveniences here also: Linoleum on the floor, steam pressure cooker, scissors, sink drainer, towel bar, soap basket, high stool, mirror, and wastebasket with a handle, designed to retain all dust. Among the saucepans in the closet below the sink are the unmistakable pans that are used in fireless cookers, so we can assume that this homemaker has that labor and fuel-saving device in addition to her large gas stove.

LEG OF LAMB IS CHOICEST MEAT

Americans Seem to Be Neglecting Delicious Dish.

(Prepared by the National Department of Agriculture.)

Here is a menu built around one of the choicest of all meats, leg of lamb. We call it spring lamb, although as a matter of fact it is on sale in large towns and city markets the year around, according to the United States Department of Agriculture. American people as a whole do not seem to appreciate lamb and mutton. Americans, for instance, eat only about five pounds of mutton and lamb per person each year, and nearly half the total quantity eaten in the United States is by the people of the Atlantic Seaboard states. Canadians and French people consume ten pounds of lamb and mutton per person each year, the British twenty-five pounds, and the Argentinians twenty-eight pounds. Great Britain moreover has to import large quantities of her lamb and mutton, whereas we have an abundant home-grown supply. One of the great piers in Liverpool harbor is given over to the so-called mutton steamers which bring meat from Australia and Argentine. To judge by these other countries, Americans, especially in the states of the Middle West and South, seem to be neglecting a delicious meat when they fail to serve lamb and mutton often on their dinner tables.

To go with roast leg of lamb, custom of course dictates green peas. Nobody seems to know just where the combination of lamb and peas originated or why it should be so firmly fixed, but there is no question that it tastes good. If fresh peas are not to be had, there are canned ones, of course, to fall back on.

Buttered spring onions served on toast if you wish would, we believe, be just right for the second vegetable with lamb and peas. Lamb has a flavor all its own and most people like it best when other pronounced flavors are served with it. This is the reason behind the traditional mint sauce or mint jelly with lamb, so we are including that, too. If you cannot get mint or do not have mint jelly on hand, currant or any other tart jelly or conserve will do. The main thing is to have a good sharp flavor that cuts the lamb fat and tones down its pronounced flavor. Potatoes browned with the meat may be served or not, as you like.

Also another thing in serving lamb hot, have it hot, piping hot, if it is to be hot at all. Put it on a hot platter as soon as it comes from the oven, carve it quickly before it cools, and serve it on hot plates. The fat of lamb is different from that of most of our common meats. As the scientists put it, mutton and lamb fat has a high melting point. In other words it has to become and be kept hot to stay in a liquid state. Or in still other words, as soon as lamb fat cools even a little, it hardens and sticks to the plate. It then sticks to the tongue and to the roof of the mouth, too, when it is eaten, because it requires more heat to melt it completely than we can give it. Because of this peculiarity about lamb fat, some families have become prejudiced against even the lean meat when just a simple practice of serving it hot would have made it well liked by everybody.

Choose a plump well-fatted leg weighing 4½ to 5½ or 6 pounds. Prepare the leg for roasting by wiping it off with a damp cloth. Rub salt over the outside. Some cooks believe in rubbing flour over it too, and some do not. The meat will be good either way. Then place the meat with the bone side up in a heavy roasting pan, preferably on a rack, and put it in a very hot oven (about 500 degrees Fahrenheit). (If roasted in this position the thick portion of meat will be most convenient for carving.) Let the meat stay at this high temperature for 20 minutes until it sears over; then let the oven cool down to a moderate temperature (about 350 degrees Fahrenheit) and continue the roasting for 2 to 2½ hours, depending on the size of the leg. A general rule is to allow 15 minutes per pound, counting out the time required for searing. Most people prefer lamb well done, though it should not be cooked so long that it is dry. Baste occasionally during roasting with the drippings, but do not add any water. Leg of lamb is one of the tender cuts which should be cooked at fairly high temperature and needs no moisture added during cooking. If water were added it would simply serve to draw out the juices and take away from the rich flavor of the meat itself. Be sure also to carve crosswise of the grain through the thickest portion of the leg.

For dessert have blackberry ice cream made with fresh berries, and sunshine cake.

Cheese Rich in Calcium

Cheese is one of the richest of all our common foods in calcium. Many Americans do not get enough calcium in their foods to furnish their bodies with the quantity of this mineral needed for building and repairing teeth and bones. Cheese made from whole milk also contains a considerable quantity of fat. Because of this fat and the fact that the protein of cheese is of the same efficient kind as that in meat, a cheese combination is excellent to use occasionally as the main dish at dinner or supper.

WAYS WITH GRAPE JUICE

The average person thinks of grape juice with tinkling glasses of icy drinks, but the fact is that grape-juice drinks may be fully as popular with many, piping hot. After a winter ride, or skating party, or a fatiguing day, a hot drink of grape juice is not only a tonic but a valuable food.

For variety a clove or a stick of cinnamon may be added to each glass, or a raisin or two; heat them in the juice and serve very hot.

Grape juice added to ginger ale when served cold, makes a fine combination.

Jellied Grape Juice Salad.—Prepare a package of pineapple, orange or lemon gelatin, using one cupful of water, then when slightly cool add a cupful of grape juice. When this begins to congeal add one and one-half cupfuls of diced, canned or fresh fruit, including fresh grapes, halved and seeded. Place in molds and when firm unmold on lettuce. Serve with mayonnaise dressing and garnish with roses of mayonnaise.

Ham Baked in Grape Juice.—Scrub a medium-sized ham and plunge into boiling water containing two tablespoonfuls of mixed spices. Simmer for three hours for a ten-pound ham. Remove from the water and peel off half of the skin, leaving the remainder to keep the ham moist. Place the ham in a baking pan and dust the exposed portions with sugar and dried bread crumbs; pour over a half cupful of grape juice. Around the ham place well-scrubbed greening apples. Add one cupful each of water and grape juice, one-fourth cupful of sugar. Bake until the apples are tender. Baste the apples occasionally with grape juice and serve the ham garnished with the apples, celery and olives. Thicken the sauce in the pan with a tablespoonful of flour to a cupful of sauce and serve as a sauce with the ham.

Grape Juice Salad Dressing.—Whip a cupful of heavy cream slightly sour; when stiff add five tablespoonfuls of grape juice and a few grains of salt. Use as a salad dressing over canned pears, celery and lettuce which has been dipped in French dressing.

Grape Juice and Banana Dessert.—Whip one cupful of heavy cream until stiff, add one-third of a cupful of grape juice, three tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar and a pinch of salt. Serve over sliced bananas.

Some Good Things.

One of the best of tomato soups is prepared as follows:

Tomato Soup.—Fry one tablespoonful each of butter, parsley and onion for five minutes. Add one tablespoonful of cornstarch, and when well cooked add one quart of tomatoes, one pint of boiling water, one tablespoonful of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, one-eighth of a teaspoonful of pepper, four cloves and four peppercorns. Cook fifteen minutes, strain and serve.

Steamed Molasses Pudding.—Beat one egg, add one-fourth of a cupful of molasses, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one-fourth of a cupful of sugar, one and one-fourth cupfuls of flour, two teaspoonfuls of soda dissolved in one-half cupful of water. Steam in small molds one hour. Serve with an egg sauce.

Cream of Chestnut Soup.—Shell and blanch a pint of chestnuts. Cook until tender and press through a sieve. To two cupfuls of chestnut pulp add salt and pepper to season. Take one cupful each of milk and cream, two tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour, cook together until thick, add the cream, chestnut mixture, and when very hot, serve.

Ginger Ale Salad.—Soften one-fourth of a package of gelatin in one-fourth of a cupful of water, stand over a dish of hot water to dissolve, add a grating of lemon rind and one and three-fourths cupfuls of ginger ale. Turn into molds to chill. Serve very cold on heart leaves of lettuce with either French or mayonnaise dressing, to a cupful of which is added three tablespoonfuls or more of cocktail sauce.

The following personals are taken from The News of 26 years ago. The paper was edited by M. E. Olds:

John Tustison is home from Ohio for a few days.

Fred Jenkins visited relatives in Toledo during the past week.

There will be several graduates from the St. Joe school this term.

Mrs. Grace Murray and daughter of New York City, are visiting in town the guests of Mr. and Mrs. O. H. Widney.

Prof. Sturgis is organizing an orchestra at this place for use in the new opera house. One good thing brings another.

Frank Rhoades secured the contract for furnshing 60 cords of wood to the school board at this place for next winter's use. One dollar was the price paid.

John Hull will put a new front in his business room as soon as the weather will permit. It will be occupied by the Hadsells with a stock of sewing machines and McCormick harvesters.

Wm. Leighty has engaged to sell goods for E. Case & Co. this summer.

Miss Cora Widney is spending a few days with her sister at Defiance.

Mack Leighty from this township, is one of the grand jurors this month.

Preparations are being made to boom every line of business in St. Joe this season.

It looks like business to see the constant stream of teams that are now hauling logs into St. Joe.

Mrs. Sadie Wilson of Hicksville will locate in St. Joe to engage in the dressmaking business. She comes highly recommended as a first class dressmaker and will be here ready for business about the first of April. She has engaged rooms of Mrs. Swineford.

O. H. Widney showed us the design for his brick block this week, and it will be a handsome building when completed and an ornament to our lively little town. Material is fast being placed on the ground and work will be commenced as soon as the weather will permit.

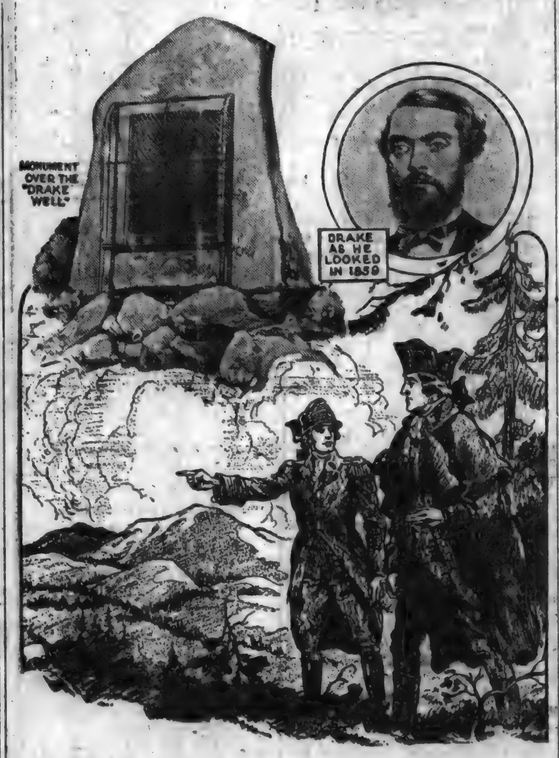
Washington's Early Adventures Now Assuming New Significance



By HENRY BOTSFORD

AFTER well nigh a century and three-quarters a new interest has recently been aroused in the earliest military adventures of George Washington. When barely twenty-one years old, in 1753, Washington was sent by Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia into the far northwestern wilderness—that is, northwestern Pennsylvania—to warn the French that they must cease their efforts to occupy that region. Recent researches have given a new historical significance to that expedition, during which Washington, always reckless of his personal safety, had one of his narrow escapes from death at the hands of a treacherous Indian guide.

The French at that time occupied Canada and claimed the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys. Though the fringe of English speaking colonies along the Atlantic contained the chief European population, France maintained sovereignty over most of North America's area. They were apparently determined to occupy northwestern Pennsylvania, partly because it was known even then to be rich in petroleum.

Region's Wealth Known

Pioneers and missionaries, English, French, German and Dutch, had all reported to their governments that the petroleum was of great potential value. There is, however, no reason to believe that Washington knew of its existence or value until his adventure of 1753. Then he learned that the oil had long been used by the Indians and the pioneering whites for fuel and light, for medicine and in making war paint. Washington was so much impressed with its possibilities that he later became owner of a large area of oil-bearing lands. Although the petroleum industry in its modern form was then undreamed of, Washington was so sure that a fortune resided in his oil-bearing lands that in his will he listed them as his most valuable holdings. In the property schedule attached to the will he wrote:

"This tract was taken up by General Lewis and myself on account of the bituminous spring which it contains, of so inflammable a nature as to burn as freely as spirits and as nearly difficult to extinguish."

The Will of Washington

Some historians declare that in an earlier will Washington dedicated this "burning spring" to the public. At any rate, it had passed from his ownership before his death. He sold this tract for $200,000, but, suspecting it might revert to his estate under a mortgage, he warned his heirs that should it do so it would be worth much more than the $200,000.

Although Washington's first knowledge of petroleum was gained within a few miles of the place where the first oil well in the world was drilled, that first well was not opened until one hundred and six years later, 1859. In that year Edwin Laurentine Drake bored the first well, just south of Titusville, Pennsylvania, and really started the modern petroleum industry.

A Development Wonder

Today the American industry is the major part of the world's oil business. Americans are directing oil developments all over the world. It is all part of the huge problem: to make sure that the tomorrows shall see America's requirements met. Every decade the production of petroleum has doubled. Science and technical progress have met all demands. Foreign investment and development are in the nature of insurance for the future.

In the days of Drake and the industry's beginnings petroleum's value lay in lubricants and kerosene. The age of machinery was only beginning, with its insatiate demand for lubricants, while kerosene, though the best illuminant ever known, was dangerous because poor refining left gasoline that was liable to explode. It is difficult nowadays, when the world is being combed for more petroleum to make more gasoline, to realize that gasoline was once a nuisance and a menace. The internal combustion engine created the demand for gasoline, now the primary product of petroleum. The demands of millions of motor cars increasing constantly, invention and chemistry were set at work by the captains of the industry to make the barrel of petroleum turn out a larger and larger proportion of gasoline. This was done by the cracking process, through which every year now sees a larger proportion of crude oil turned into gasoline.

High and Growing Demands

Today well-nigh 2,500,000 barrels of petroleum are required every day to satisfy the demand for motor cars, tractors, trucks, buses, artificial gas plants and the innumerable by-products. Invention is constantly finding new uses, as enterprise just as constantly finds new supplies of petroleum. The wonderful and rather mysterious fluid has revolutionized social habits and industrial methods; yet it is only two-thirds of a century since the industry had its feeble beginning in the Pennsylvania oil country.

This year the country will use about 750,000,000 barrels of petroleum. The country will use 700,000,000 gallons of gasoline and will export 1,900,000 more. The production, processing and marketing of petroleum is probably second only to agriculture among American industries.

Roundly, 70 per cent of the world's petroleum industry is American. Ten billions of capital is invested in it—half the valuation of the national railroad system. It employs just about 1,000,000 people. The petroleum pipe line system, gridironing a good share of the country, aggregates about 85,000 miles. Petroleum revolutionized naval warfare by bringing in the oil burning ship; it is fast revolutionizing merchant marines in the same fashion. Multiplication of motor cars, along with the special taxation of their gasoline, has made possible the modern highway system.

A True Social Service

Perhaps the most nearly revolutionary result of Drake's modernisation of the petroleum industry is to be found in the change it has brought in the life of rural America. It has carried the city to the country, the country to the city. It has, by making possible the cheap and quick transportation that everybody nowadays enjoys, enabled country and city to know and understand each other as they never did before. It has brought social and educational privileges to country dwellers that a few decades ago seemed absolutely denied to them. On the one hand it has enabled the cities to spread out into suburban areas and the zone of country estates; on the other, it has enabled the people of the open country to have neighbors, society, church and school privileges, intimate acquaintance.

It is a historic fact that the tendency toward division of interest and understanding between city and country is the most serious internal menace to the security of nations, to the integrity of society.

More than anything else, country and city need to know and understand each other and each other's problems. The easy transportation, the ready opportunity for association and acquaintance that have come with the Age of Petroleum have made possible, in this favored country at least, exactly this new intimacy and understanding.

DEFIANCE BANK ROBBERY SATURDAY

Six armed and unmasked bandits escaped with loot, estimated at $50,000, when they held up the Merchants National bank, Saturday, at 9:15 a. m., a quarter of an hour after the doors opened.

Five men, heavily armed, entered the building while the sixth remained at the wheel of a high-powered car with motor running.

Eight employes of the bank, including President Fred S. Stever, were compelled to lie face downward on the floor, while the safe was looted.

With a pistol pressed against his back, Cashier R. L. Gleason opened the inner safe in the vault. The leader, armed with a sawed-off shotgun at first tried to make President Stever open the safe. He did not know the combination, hence Cashier Gleason was called.

The gang worked quietly and swiftly, with precision as though they were experienced hands. Five minutes and they were gone.

President Stever said cash taken is less than $12,000 with the remainder estimated in bonds.

The robbery was staged with little excitement and slight disturbance. The only rough tactics were used against President Stever. When ordered to the floor, he said he thought it a joke at first and smilingly hesitated. His action angered the leader who dashed through the swinging door into the compartment where the chief officials desk was located, kicked President Stever on the shins and grabbed him by the collar to force him to the floor.

After the valuables were in a bag, four of the men quietly walked out to join the man in the car while one of the guards covered the place with his gun.

Sheriff Adrian Miller and Chief of Police Karl A. Weaner traced the bandit's car—Hudson sedan—south of Defiance on the Defiance-Paulding road, No. 111.

The sedan carried an Ohio license plate 818,993 which Chief Weaner said was issued through Toledo. This fact links the Defiance robbery with a series of bank robberies in northwestern Ohio. All are believed to have been the work of the same gang for the same kind of a car has been used.

Kermit Skinner, 12 years old, provided police with the tag number. He was washing windows at Rourke's Specialty Store, two doors to the north, when the gang entered the bank. He became suspicious and jotted down the number. In his excitement he broke the lead of his pencil and had to chew the wood around the lead before he could write down the number.

As soon as the bandits left, he turned the number over to police who believe it will prove valuable in the hunt for the fugitives.

THE SEAL OF SAFETY

What is the most valuable and least expensive holiday gift you can make? ST. JOE NEWS.

VOL. XL ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1926 NUMBER 49

CHRISTMAS CHECKS ARE NOW BEING ISSUED

The St. Joe Valley Bank will issue its Christmas savings checks within a few days. The Clubs this year are of an average, ranging from $25 to $50 and it is affording the officers a great deal of pleasurs and satisfaction in sending out these checks, and all going to people of this community.

The past year sixty-five members were enrolled in the local club, totaling an amount of $2,-657, which is a very healthy increase over 1925 when $1,511 was distributed to St. Joe people. Of the above number but ten are children, and the checks run from $5.00 to $500.00.

Plans are already made for the 1927 Christmas Savings Clubs and the bank will start immediately with new accounts for next year. Those who have been making a practice of this method of saving find it a big help when time comes for the usual holiday purchases. The money is at hand where in many cases it is not always so easily brought up at this time. We believe the bank will enjoy a larger number of Christmas Savings Club customers the coming year than they have ever had. Make your plans to start again this month.

There are 7,800,000 members of the Christmas Savings Clubs in the United States.

About $400,000,000.00, to be exact $398,268,000.00 will be distributed to these 7,800,000 members of the Christmas Clubs during the next few days. This figure represents an increase in Christmas club savings over 1925 of about $85,000,000.00, or 27 per cent., while the increase in the number of members over 1924 is 11½ per cent.

The average distribution per member amounts to $51.32. This is an increase of about 11 per cent over 1925 when per member distribution was $44.88.

In addition to being a record distribution for the Christmas Club to a record membership, more banks participated in the movement during 1926 than ever before. While the increase for the entire country over the preceding year was 27 per cent, the increase for Greater New York amounted to 32 per cent.

This is the result of a growing number of banking institutions in the United States realizing the benefits to be derived from making the Christmas Club plan available to their depositors.

On the basis of calculations made by H. F. Rawll, President of the Christmas Club, something like $179,421,380.00 will be placed immediately into the stores of the country in the rush of Christmas buying; $110,146,400.00 will be deposited in permanent savings and thrift accounts; $47,186,382.00 will go for insurance premiums and mortgage interests; $42,761,-190.00 will go for taxes and $18,-752,648.00 will go to fixed charges maturing in the holiday season.

COUNTY TAX AMOUNTS TO $1,020,000

The collections during the fall tax paying period were $450,400, Carrie P. Weaver, county treasurer, reports.

This makes a total for the year of more than $1,020,000, and sets a new record. The next highest was in 1922, when the amount was approximately $1,000,000. In 1925 the collections were $977,000.

The New York Central Railroad Co., with $45,866.74, continues to be the county's largest taxpayer. The Baltimore & Ohio sent $37,-713.10 for its fall installment, the Wabash $7,182.60, the Indiana Service Corporation $3,582.47 and the Pennsylvania $4,526.66.

The Auburn Automobile Co., with $11,362.36, paid more than any other county industry. The Auburn Rubber Co., remitted $4,-259.78.

Conspicuous among other payments this fall are the followng persons that you are acquainted with:—

Ashton Staman, $374.22.
Samuel Hindman, $231.13.
S. L. Widney, $273.59.
C. F. Kinsey, $284.46.
Harry Draggoo, $341.44.
H. M. Widney, $263.11.

The banks of the county paid as follows: Auburn State bank, $1,672.58; City National bank of Auburn, $1,510.12; First National bank of Butler $354.93; Knisely Bros. & Co., bank of Butler $998.-80; Citizens State bank of Waterloo $636.88; St. Joe Valley bank, $272.04; Ashley State bank, $398.-86; Garrett State bank, $1,349.40; Garrett Savings Loan and Trust Co., $509.80; Farmers and Merchants bank of Spencerville. $244.-59.

SILVER WEDDING CELEBRATION

A very pleasant gathering was held Sunday at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Millimen when several relatives and friends arrived to remind them of their silver wedding anniversary. A delicious dinner was served, the centerpiece being a large cake upon which were twenty-five lighted candles and the inscription "25." Many useful and beautiful gifts of silver were received.

Those present were: Mr. and Mrs. Warren Coburn and son, Roscoe, Mr. and Mrs. M. E. Gruber and son, Junior, Miss Lucile Smith and A. G. Hercules of Ft. Wayne; Mrs. Mary Shuff, Marion Milliman, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Beaber and Mr. and Mrs. Fremont Abel.

DOG IS MISSING AT BEABER HOME

Last week, three strange men drove up to the Wilson Beaber home, east of town, and made inquiry of Mr. Beaber as to whether or not he would sell his dog. Two men remained in the car and while the third was doing the bargaining the dog was coaxed into the car. After talking for some time, the stranger was given a signal and he said they would return the next day and see him again. After they left the dog failed to appear and Mr. Beaber is satisfied they had taken the dog while he talked with the stranger. Would you call that stealing, when taken right before your eyes?

ENROLLMENT FOR PEST HUNT CLOSES SATURDAY

An extention of one week was given members of Game Club to enroll for pest hunt, for week of December 20-25, making Saturday, December 11th, the last day. At the last meeting thirty members had paid in their money and the reason of extending the time was because others wished to participate. The committee will meet next Saturday evening and choose members for the hunt. The losers will furnish program and lunch on Wednesday evening, the 29th, at the school house.

CLARK SCHOLES HAD AUTO STOLEN SUNDAY

Last Sunday, Clark Scholes and Donald Kinsey made a trip to Ft. Wayne, parking the machine, a Chevrolet coupe, in front of the Y. M. C. A., until they were ready to return home and then someone else had driven it away.

Clark reported the theft to the police and not knowing his license number, delayed search until Monday, when he telegraphed the department at Indianapolis. Tuesday morning a call came stating that they had the car.

Charles V

A GOUTY old man sat in a monastery cell, surrounded by dozens of clocks and watches.

"I cannot even make two clocks tick in unison," he whined peevishly. "No wonder I failed to make millions of people think alike!"

The old clock fancier was Charles V, who had given up affairs of state at the age of fifty-six, and who was spending the two remaining years of his life in monastic retirement. He had had a half century of experiences such as lent a certain pathos to his complaint about the clocks. Born in 1500 to the greatest power ever inherited by mortal man, he had risen to heights reached by no other ruler of his century and had lived to see his most cherished plans fall to pieces.

Here are some of the titles that Charles fell heir to, as a mere boy: the archduchy of Austria, the sovereignty of the Netherlands, the kingdoms of Spain, Sicily and Navarre, and the rulership of all Spain's American possessions. In addition to this, when only nineteen, he was chosen emperor of Germany, and at twenty-six was crowned king of Italy. He ruled four nations which had nothing in common and no ties of mutual interest. These facts, of course, led to endless rivalries, revolts and international complications.

Moreover, a throng of outside enemies rose against the young monarch. Francis I, king of France, who had been one of his competitors for the German crown, promptly declared war on him, seizing the duchies of Milan and Burgundy, which Charles regarded as his own. Soliman, the Magnificent (under whom, from 1520 to 1566, Turkey reached its pinnacle of greatness), invaded Hungary, advancing to the very walls of Vienna, and, with his fleets, held the Mediterranean, menacing Italy and Spain. The Netherlands, too, were ripening for revolt, while a furious revolution broke out in Spain.

Added to this, an Augustinian monk of Germany, Martin Luther, defied the pope, protested against certain tenets of the Catholic church and advanced a "reformed" creed. He drew to him thousands of Germans, his adherents becoming known as "Protestants." The security of the Catholic church, of which Charles was the acknowledged champion, was thus menaced. Altogether he had his hands full.

To beat back France's armies on the Flemish frontier and in Italy, to check the Turks on the Mediterranean and in his own duchy of Austria, to stem the tide of religious disagreements and to reconcile clashing political parties—this was the task before him. He entered on an eight-year war with France, during which he drove the French from Italy and captured King Francis. He forced a humiliating treaty on Francis. This the latter at once broke, but in a second war was again beaten.

Soliman led a great Turkish army over the German frontier and Charles advanced in person to meet him, and drove the Turks back to their own territory. Then Francis, forming an alliance with Soliman, again invaded Italy. But Charles opposed the allies so successfully that they were soon glad to sign a treaty of peace. The revolt in Spain was put down and the Netherlands for the time appeased, so Charles had at last time to attend to the Reformation, which, under Luther, Melancthon and other teachers, had by this time swept Germany from end to end. The emperor had crushed every military foe and had humiliated every royal rival; but here, in this new religious movement at home, he found an opponent he could not conquer—a power that throve under persecution.

Council after council was held, scheme after scheme proposed. Compromises were suggested, but found favor with neither party. As if this one setback had undermined his whole edifice of greatness, so the failure of Charles in reconciling the religious sects was followed by a series of new disappointments and misfortunes. He had hoped to bequeath all his power and possessions to his son Philip, but to this the German electors would not agree. So he foresaw that on his death the mighty one-man empire he held would be split up as had those of Alexander and Charlemagne. To add to his worries, Henry II (son of Francis I) of France, backed by other rulers, invaded Germany and captured several important cities, notably Metz. Charles sought to recapture Metz, but failed, and until 1870 it remained in French hands.

Charles made one more throw of the dice against fate. He arranged a marriage between his son Philip and Queen Mary of England, thus forming an English alliance to strengthen his own power and that of the Catholic church. But the couple had no children to perpetuate the scheme.

His most cherished plans set at naught, his own subjects refusing to be guided by him in matters of religion, his health broken, his territory successfully invaded, his son debarred from inheriting his chief possessions—the combination was too much for the old emperor. He gave up his throne and left to others the helm of state which would no longer obey his enfeebled hand.

His was that saddest of fates: The fate of the man who outlives the greatness he himself had created.

"Can Do"

The Chinese have a characteristically brief and monosyllabic expression which some of us might do well to adopt, especially in times of emergency—"Can Do!"

There are many occasions in a busy housewife's life when it does seem as if she could not do the tasks that lie before her. Physical weariness, pressure of many duties coming all at once, lack of the special knowledge demanded, all these may make the burden seem too great to be borne, and the temptation to give up is hard to resist. But if she tries, realizing that the success of the home rests upon her, she "can do."

I know a young mother who saved her baby's life by whispering this phrase over and over. A friend returned from China had told her of the words, and she remembered them in a critical moment. In trying to move a very large bookcase so that she might sweep behind it, she jerked it around so suddenly that it toppled forward—top-heavy thing that it was—and started to fall. Her creeping baby sat playing on the floor directly in front of the bookcase!

Bracing her slender body and slim uplifted arms against the great piece of furniture, she called for help, and almost immediately heard swift footsteps coming down the stairs to her aid. Even so there were several minutes during which her child's life was at stake. Could she hold the heavy case back until help came? Could she? She tried to pray, but the only words that came to her agonized mind were: "Can do—can do—can do!" And from some source deep within her mother-love came the phenomenal strength required.

We women must be ready to face sudden demands upon our presence of mind, our ingenuity, our strength and courage. Crises come in every life, emergencies when we must exceed our ordinary ability. Even more difficult, perhaps, are the times of petty discouragement, when there is not the great imperative need to act. But the same strength and endurance are available always, and if we will forget self and assert our mastery over the adverse condition, we "can do."

The First Gray Hair

Not long ago I went to a women's club luncheon, where I sat next to a charming fresh-cheeked woman with youthful eyes and alert manner, from under whose chic spring hat soft waves of snow-white hair could be seen. The usual banal compliment about the attractive combination of white hair and young face rose to my lips before I could halt it. But my companion showed an even row of white teeth that matched the hair, as she smiled her thanks.

"My hair began to turn before I was twenty-five," she told me. "I remember very well the morning when I saw the first gray hair and plucked it out as if it had been a venomous reptile. Like most young women I regarded it as the advance guard of old age, and it seemed to me I was doomed. I secretly began to study the advertisements of hair-dyes and had almost decided to try one of them when a friend pointed out to me, at a concert, a woman in front of us who dyed her hair. It was coarse, uneven, gummy, of several shades, and it resembled a cheap wig more than anything else.

"Then I went home and thought the thing out. I made up my mind that if my hair was going to turn, nothing could stop it, and that the more I dyed it the more I would have to. After all, I told myself, wouldn't it be better to have white hair early and get it over with than to ruin my hair for a few years and then have to have it whiten with genuine age? While my face was still young and clear-colored, the white hair could not make me look really old; in fact, it seemed to be becoming to many faces.

"So I let my hair turn as fast as it would, taking exquisite care of it and keeping up my complexion and my youthful carriage as much as I could.

"And now what is happening to me? I have just passed my half-century mark—yes, fifty!" (I registered my incredulity.) "But I cannot get gray with age—I am already white. Nobody tells me I am getting older, for nobody notices it. I am sliding easily past that awkward age of woman, when age begins to make its inroads upon her. I take beautiful care of my skin, and I keep my mind and body flexible by dancing and playing golf and tennis, and by keeping up with new ideas. This is what I call growing old gracefully."

Have Kidneys Examined By Your Doctor

Take Salts to Wash Kidneys If Back Pains You or Bladder Bothers

Flush your kidneys by drinking a quart of water each day, also take salts occasionally, says a noted authority, who tells us that too much rich food forms acids which almost paralyze the kidneys in their efforts to expel it from the blood. They become sluggish and weaken; then you may suffer with a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, your stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine gets cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get sore and irritated, obliging you to seek relief two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids, to help cleanse the kidneys and flush off the body's urinous waste, get four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy here; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days, and your kidneys may then act fine. This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush and stimulate sluggish kidneys; also to neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer irritate, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive, cannot injure and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink.

SELECTING AND COOKING CHOPS

If Cut Too Thin They Are Liable to Dry Out.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Doesn't your family enjoy chops for a change? For dinner you can serve any kind of lamb chops—loin or rib, shoulder or leg—or the corresponding cuts of mutton, if it is sold in your markets; or the veal chops from rib or loin. Whether you broil or panbroil them, if the chops are selected from a good grade of meat and are cooked with care to retain their juiciness and tenderness, they will have a zestful flavor and characteristic quality unexcelled by any cut of meat. In buying chops it is well to have them cut to order; otherwise they may be cut so thin that they toughen and dry out in cooking. The butcher has to meet public demand and many of his customers want a large number of chops from any given weight rather than a few thick juicy ones. In cutting rib and T-bone chops, the width of the bone may well be the guide, cutting one chop to each rib or each section of the bone in the loin. For other cuts the thickness should be at least three-quarters of an inch.

Whichever kind of chops you choose, and no matter which method of cooking you use, plan to serve your dinner the moment the chops are done, so that they will be piping hot. Of course you will see that the dinner plates are hot, too. Any attempt to keep chops warm after they are done to a turn usually results in overcooking them or making them greasy.

Lamb and veal chops are usually preferred well done, but not dry. A "rare" mutton chop is often expected. Both lamb and mutton chops have so much surrounding fat that they are usually broiled or pan-broiled rather than fried. More or less superfluous fat and skin is, even then, trimmed from them before they are cooked. The chief point about any method of cooking chops is to sear the outside at once at a high temperature to prevent the juices from escaping. To broil chops in a gas oven, put them on the rack in the pan that slides under the flame and turn them several times. Many people think that a chop broiled over live coals or a wood fire has no equal. For this a greased wire broiler is used. Pan-broiling is done in a heavy iron skillet heated hissing hot. The chops are put in, turned as soon as the under surface is seared on the other side. Then turn them often, lifting them between two forks to avoid piercing the surface and losing the meat juice. They will be well done in 10 or 12 minutes. Serve promptly on a hot platter, with or without a tomato, onion, or brown sauce. Chops, like broiled steaks, should be seasoned when eaten rather than during the cooking because salt draws out the juices.

French chops are the rib chops which have had all superfluous skin and flank trimmed closely from the bone. The butcher usually does this. They are used for formal occasions with a little paper frill concealing the scraped bone which sometimes chars on cooking. For the ordinary family dinner, however, French chops are not an economical selection.

As veal chops have much less fat in proportion to lean meat than lamb chops, they are likely to dry out considerably before they are cooked through unless protected by a coating of egg and bread crumbs. Choice veal, however, is excellent prepared in this way. It is called breaded veal. You simply fry it in deep or shallow fat according to your preference. Sometimes veal is dry and tough so that it must be prepared by a method which will develop tenderness. For such veal, season, dip it in flour, and then cook it in shallow fat until a crust is formed on both sides. Then add hot water and simmer the meat slowly until tender. It will be surrounded by a rich brown gravy. This gives a much tastier meat dish than another method some housekeepers use in which they first parboil the veal and then dip it in egg and flour and brown it in fat.

A little more seasoning is usually liked with veal than with other chops. Before dipping in the egg and bread crumbs or in flour sprinkle each chop on both sides with a few drops of lemon, worcestershire sauce, and if you like, onion juice, as well as salt and pepper. A tomato sauce is often served with veal.

Mint or currant jelly goes especially well with lamb chops.

Cook Shredded Carrots in Milk for Children

This is an ideal way to prepare them for children because it is adding calcium to calcium for building teeth and bones. And we believe that you will find, too, that the grown-up members of the family who turned up their noses at carrots before will think that they have discovered a new vegetable when they taste them prepared in this way. For a family of five you will need about one quart of the shredded raw carrots. Use a coarse grater or vegetable slicer and you can prepare the carrots in a very few minutes. For this quantity of carrots you need about a pint of milk. Bring the milk to the boiling point, add the shredded carrots, and let them cook gently for from 15 to 20 minutes. Add about ½ teaspoonful of salt, 2 tablespoonfuls of butter, and serve with the milk around them. The natural bright color of the carrots seems to be made even brighter by the cooking in milk and the flavor is delicate and sweet. If the milk is allowed to boil up while the carrots are cooking it forms a scum and they are not so attractive.

There Are Various Ways of Cooking Sally Lunns

There are various kinds of Sally Lunns, some raised with yeast, some with baking powder. Here is a recipe for the yeast-raised kind. The ingredients are: 1½ cupfuls milk, 2 eggs, ½ cupful water (lukewarm), 1½ cakes yeast, 4 tablespoonfuls butter, 3 teaspoonfuls salt, 4 tablespoonfuls sugar, 4 cupfuls flour. Scald the milk, add the sugar, salt and butter and allow the mixture to cool. Soften the yeast in the water. When the milk is lukewarm add the yeast, the beaten egg and the flour. Pour the batter into a buttered pan, and allow it to rise to double its bulk. With this quantity of yeast it should rise and be ready for baking in 3 to 4 hours, but the exact time depends on a number of things and cannot be given definitely. Try to time it, though, so that your "Sally" will be hot for dinner. Before putting it into the oven, sprinkle the top with sugar and cinnamon and bake in a moderately hot oven.

GRAHAM MUFFINS FINE FOR BREAKFAST

Graham Muffins Are Always Acceptable for Breakfast.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Here is a recipe for graham muffins which will answer for hot bread at breakfast and toasted muffins at dinner by making double the quantity given:

2 cupfuls milk
4 to 6 tbsp. melted fat
2 eggs
4 tsp. baking powder
2 cupfuls coarse graham flour or 3½ cupfuls fine graham flour measured without sifting
1 to 2 tblsp. sugar, if desired
1 tsp. salt

Mix the dry ingredients. Beat the eggs slightly and add to the milk. Stir the liquid mixture gradually into the dry and add the melted fat last. Bake in greased tins in hot oven, that is, 400 to 425 degrees F. You can use this recipe for wheat muffins made of soft-wheat or pastry flour by allowing 4 cupfuls of flour in place of the amount of graham flour given.

POULTRY

FEEDING PULLETS IN COLD SEASON

Pullets must be well developed, vigorous and must carry a surplus of body fat if they are to produce heavily during the winter months.

D. C. Henderson, poultry specialist in the South Dakota State college extension service, says that pullets which come into laying with weak frames and undeveloped bodies usually break down under the strain of egg production during the winter months. He advises a careful feeding program for pullets so that they will have the surplus body fat so necessary to heavy egg production.

"Feeds containing protein and minerals are essential for proper growth of bones, feathers and muscles," he says. "Skim milk, if available in sufficient quantity, is an excellent feed. The birds should be given access to the milk at all times. It can be fed either in the sweet or sour form.

"If the milk is limited, part of the protein may be supplied through the use of meat scraps or tankage in a mash mixture."

A dry mash mixture which Henderson advises for satisfactory development of pullets is composed of one part each by weight of cornmeal, ground heavy oats, wheat bran, flour middlings and tankage.

One pound of salt should be added to each 100 pounds of mash. If a limited amount of milk is available, one-half part of tankage may be fed in the mash. Dry mash should be kept in the hoppers before the birds at all times.

Grain is necessary for the proper storing of a reserve of fat in the body, states the specialist. Late hatched pullets should be forced heavily with both bran and mash to develop flesh and bone, essential in continuous heavy egg production. Early hatched pullets, that are well developed and are coming into laying should be fed heavily on grain feeds and sparingly on dry mash. The pullet flock must carry a surplus of body flesh, obtained primarily from grain feeds, if they are to give profitable winter egg production.

Late Laying Hens Best for Building Up Flock

Eggs usually are the chief source of income from the farm poultry business and one of the quickest ways to build up the egg-laying capacity of the flock is to breed from the best of the late laying hens rather than from the young pullets which have not had a chance to show their worth as layers. Only those late laying hens which have the proper size, type and other desirable characteristics should be used in the breeding pen. Poorly colored birds and those with disqualifications, such as side spriga on the comb and stubs on the legs, are undesirable as breeders, the poultrymen say.

The most desirable of the late laying hens which molt as late as September 15 or later should be mated with the best males of the flock or preferably with males secured from a breeder of a good strain of production-bred stock.

Arranging Nests for Easy Cleaning Is Best Plan

Arrange nests for the hens and the new pullets as soon as possible. It is best they become accustomed to this equipment so that they are not afraid of it later on. If possible, build the nests in a long row, using a 12-inch board for the base, and square sections of same for partitions. Fasten together with hooks like screen door hooks, so the whole structure will come apart for thorough cleaning. This is infinitely better than nailing up a few old boxes, and expecting the hens to use them.

Hens prefer dark nests, and if given choice between a dark nest and a light nest, will almost always avoid the light. It is convenient, also, if you can arrange the nests along the wall, so that the eggs can be taken up without going into the scratching area. This is convenient, and avoids disturbing the chickens.

Attend to Ventilation

Those who expect any great number of winter eggs from old hens are doomed to disappointment unless they have especially favorable conditions such as electric lights. Old hens will molt. The poor layers start shedding in June while the best hens may not do so until late in the fall. And once in a while there is a hen that does not molt until December.

One must depend upon the pullet flock for satisfactory early winter egg production.

Blood Spots in Eggs

Blood spots in eggs are due to various causes, and often are not serious so far as the flock is concerned. Such spots are found quite commonly in eggs from commercial flocks, and unless in unusual numbers call for no change in management. If they do appear in larger numbers, examination of the ration to find whether there is not something wrong with it is recommended. The cause is sometimes feeding condimental foods such as pepper.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL AT THE AGE OF 63

Mother! It's Cruel to "Physic" Your Child

To Dr. W. B. Caldwell, of Monticello, Ill., a practicing physician for 47 years, it seemed cruel that so many constipated infants and children had to be kept constantly "stirred up" and half sick by taking cathartic pills, tablets, salts, calomel and nasty oils.

While he knew that constipation was the cause of nearly all children's little ills, he did not believe that a sickening "purge" or "physic" was necessary.

In Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin he discovered a laxative which helps to establish natural bowel "regularity" even if the child is chronically constipated. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin not only causes gentle, easy bowel movement but, best of all, it never gripes, sickens or upsets the most delicate system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless, and so pleasant that even a cross, feverish, bilious, sick child gladly takes it.

Buy a large 60-cent bottle at any store that sells medicine or write "Syrup Pepsin," Monticello, Illinois, for a FREE SAMPLE BOTTLE and just see for yourself.

A Small Paper Edited by John A. Provines of Spencerville

The little sheet dates back nearly forty years and is a treasure of Mrs. Mary Bowman of St. Joe. As is the custom of older ladies, about every so often they get out their stow-away chest and look over their keepsakes, and when Mrs. Bowman did that last week, she located "The Owl," a small paper then printed to advertise the Drug Store owned by Mr. Provines.

We are reproducing some valuable information, especially for those of our readers who were here forty years ago.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF SPENCERVILLE

The original organization of this Church took place at the house of William Downs, in the month of October 1849. Only nine persons joined the organization that day, as follows: John Leighty and wife, Abraham Cope and wife, George Bittenger and wife and Barbara Rummell. Rev. J. Carther was the pastor. He continued to preach for the organization for a while, after which Rev. Hoffman supplied them with preaching. About the first of the year 1851, Rev. John Seidle became their regular pastor, and under his administration a goodly number was added to the church and a constitution was adopted, and the church regularly organized, according to the laws of the General Synod. The first officers under the constitution were, Abraham Cope, Elder and George Bittenger, Deacon. Rev. Seidle only preached about one year, when he died at his home in Albion, Jan. 1852. Thus the little organization was left pastorless for four months, when Rev. Wm. Waltman became pastor, and served them for a period of a little over seven years. On the 20th of May, 1853, the congregation met and decided to build a house of worship. Peter Bishop, Soloman Bowman and Andrew Horn were elected as building trustees. This contract for the work was let to Solomon Bowman and John A. Chillis, but before the house was completed Mr. Bowman died, and the work was completed by Mr. Chillis. This however was not accomplished until the summer of 1858. On Sept. 26th, the church was solemnly dedicated, the Synod of Northern Indiana being then in session, in it. We notice by the old subscription list, that many of our fathers in the church, gave very liberally then, many making sacrifices, that they could have a church home for themselves and children. And they builded wisely and well. For thirty years their work has remained to bless the entire community. Many hundreds of people have in it, been taught the Word, and more than six hundred people have been confirmed at her alters. Rev. Caskey succeeded Rev. Waltham, but only remained one year when Rev. Waltham was recalled and remained three years, resigning Sept. 29, 1863. Rev. B. F. Hills became their next pastor and served the congregation a little over two years. Oct. 11, 1865, Rev. C. Sink was elected pastor and preached for three years, and was succeeded by Rev. Leathers, who remained one year and was succeeded by Rev. E. W. Erick, who continued his labors until Feb. 1879, being about nine years, Rev. S. Kelso succeeded him as pastor and remained about two years and a half, and was followed by Rev. E. K. Baker, who served as pastor about four years and was succeeded Sept, 13, 1885 by the present incumbent Rev. S. P. Fryberger.

Tomorrow the congregation lays the corner-stone for a new church. This building will be an ornament to our town and an honor to the congregation and community. The trustees and building committee have shown themselves to be men of perseverance and energy, and we are sure will push this enterprise to successful completion. When finished, the congregation will have as good and churchly a house as can be found in Northern Indiana. Our wish is that their prosperity may be even greater than it has been in the past.

CORUNNA DROPS SPENCERVILLE

Crimson Lose Game After Hard Battle

Spencerville, Dec. 6.—Corunna High defeated the Spencerville High team at Corunna Friday nite by a 19-14 score. Spencerville played winning ball throughout the entire game but were hindered by the small playing space of Corunna's floor. The work of Mann at back guard was a factor in keeping the Corunna score from piling up. Hollabaugh was high point man for Spencerville with six points to his credit.

The Spencerville squad will contest with Auburn Saturday night.

The Man With Three Names

By HAROLD MACGRATH

The story of a man to whom fate had dealt marked cards and cheated abominably, then, apparently relenting, had given him a single chance to stack them in his own favor. How he took the chance, what he made of it and how strangely it all affected the lives of many others! That is the story which Mr. MacGrath tells in his usual engaging manner.

Sydney Sends Fine Painting to the President

This large oil painting, showing the United States navy at anchor in Sydney harbor, Australia, July-August, 1925, was presented to President Coolidge by Sir Hugh Denison, K. B. E., the commissioner for Australia in the United States. The presentation is made by the citizens of Sydney to commemorate the event. The artist is Charles Bryant, R. O. I., a native of New South Wales, Australia. The painting will be placed in the national art gallery at Washington. At the left of the picture (left to right): J. J. Rouse, representing the Sydney citizens' committee; President Coolidge and Sir Hugh Denison. Secretary of the Navy Wilbur and Secretary of State Kellogg are shown at the right of the picture.

Pretty Things that are Made at Home

A CHRISTMAS present, be it ever so humble, carries with it the thrill of a resplendent gift, if it arrives in gay wrappings all lavishly beribboned, belabeled and betinseled. Then, too, what a personal message of friendship and love is expressed in the wrapping of a gift!

This picture suggests several new and novel ways of boxing and tying up gifts. The newest idea is the "package tree" intended for the Christmas table centerpiece. It consists of boxes in various sizes, each with a gift or more inside stacked up in a pyramid as this picture shows. In this way the family gifts can be arranged collectively. Cover each box with dark-green paper. Paste garlands of bright gummed seals on each. All sorts of tag-toys are suspended from the boxes. Streamers of tinsel are dropped down from the top. A big star cut-out surmounts the very pinnacle. Tiny candles in little holders are placed at the four corners of each box. If you are averse to using lighted candles from the standpoint of safety, and if tiny electric bulbs are not available, a very pretty effect can be secured by using star-mounted candles. To prepare these take ordinary pins or wooden tooth picks. On each paste a gummed star seal or rather two stars back to back so that the pin is inside with only its point extending. Stick a star-pin into the top of each candle. It will look almost as pretty as if the candles were lighted.

Black leatherette, new in the way of fancy paper and obtainable where tissue and crepe papers are sold, serves handsomely as a background for gilded holly tied on the box as shown in the upper left corner of this group.

One can decorate a box attractively and inexpensively by covering it with bluebird crepe paper. Five little star seals are then pasted, as you see in the picture, so as to radiate from one big star, by means of tinsel cord.

A plain box may be beautified by pasting a strip of crepe border on top bearing a Christmas tree design as here illustrated. Gold star seals paste down each edge. The gilt ribbon ties under the crepe panel.

We are living in an era of spectacular cloaking. Never such has this age and generation witnessed as it is seeing now—and wearing. Spotted and striped and in fantastic and startling combination are our fur coats. As if to compete in furnishing thrills, our cloth and knitted top coats add bold plaidings, jacquard patternings and bayadere effects in most vibrant colorings.

Perhaps the new slim, sleek suede or broadcloth black coats, which have so smartly and suddenly appeared upon the style horizon, serve by way of contrast to make the color of colorful coats look more colorful. Be that as it may, as fashion now is, the colorful cloth coat is intensely so, or else it isn't colorful at all but black through and through even to the fur which trims it and its silk lining.

The two coats in the picture are typical of gay mode. Rivaling in point of novelty the leopard-spotted fur of the tiger striped coat is spotted calfskin. Its advent into style circles is nothing short of a sensation. The remarkable thing about calfskin is how fascinatingly it works up into not only coats, but hats, hand bags, belts and various accessories. It is an open question as to which is most effective, the black and white or the beige and white spotted calfskin.

Brown sheared lamb is another youthful looking fur which is popular for "flapper" coats. For trimming the newest pelt is badger, which is employed most lavishly.

The Man With Three Names

By Harold MacGrath

(©, by Bell Syndicate.)

WNU Service

They say—the old wives—that the soul of a Galahad will never take wing because, on the day of his physical death, the white soul of him broke into infinitesimal pieces. And they proceed to add another amazing fact: that these floating particles find lodgment in the hearts of young men, die there, or grow ripely according to the quality of the soil. This remarkable information clears up a lot of fog. One understands now why Youth steps forward so confidently and bravely to admonish a naughty world. 'Tis the leaven of Sir Galahad. Crusaders are unique in that they attack an ordinary goal in an extraordinary manner, so differently from the ordinary man's way that they become the object of the ordinary man's derision. No ordinary methods for the hero of this novel. It being inconvenient to use his real name, he adopted the customary expedient of assuming an alias—three of them, in fact. And what a story it makes!

CHAPTER I

Brandon Cathewe.

Once upon a time there lay at Liverpool a great and seemly ship. A young man, sartorially correct from his tan shoes to the panama on his perfectly modeled head, looked over her rail. Suddenly he became conscious of the odor of violets. It came from behind; so he turned his head.

Supposing your consciousness had been filled for hours with the beauty of a woman's face. Say that you had seen it but once for the duration of a dinner hour, at a table half way across the huge dining-room of the Savoy, and you knew that you would never forget it.

Supposing you had built an airy romance during that hour; an adventure wherein you rescued her from an unknown danger, fell in love with her and married her. Supposing you had been all alone in mighty London that night, with no place to go, with a heart which was heavy with bitterness because fate had dealt you marked cards in the game of life and cheated you abominably. And then, by a mere twist of the head, to see that face again but three spans away from yours!

Some men are fortunate; they know exactly what they want the moment they see it. Instantly this young man knew that one of life's great problems was solved. This was The Girl. Somewhere, somehow, he was going to meet her.

She was lovely. That was the word. He knew that lovely was a universe all by itself; for it embodied beauty and intellect, valor and tenderness, youth and purity.

The westering sun was in her eyes; thus, she was unconscious of the amazed scrutiny of the young man in front. She saw only a nebulous shadow. Immediately he called her the girl with the golden eyes.

This, however, was only a flight of poetical fancy. As a matter of fact, her eyes were intensely blue; but shooting out from the pupil to the rim of the iris were fine little threads of gold such as one sees in lapis lazuli.

The young man had no plan regarding his future procedure; he would need an hour or two of solitude for the formation of this. He was going to marry her in the end; that much was definitely settled. That she might have her own views on the subject was of no vital importance.

He hurried off to his first-class cabin, stowed his luggage, changed linen; then, a straw suitcase under his arm, took up his quarters in the steerage.

For he had work to do, serious work. He could have lived like the other first-class passengers, in idleness and luxury; but he was always in earnest, whether he played or worked, as will be seen.

For six days he was determined to live among the steerage passengers. To acquire the material he needed necessitated contact, not casual observation.

That night as he leaned against the rail—a thousand ineffectual plans having been scrutinized and rejected—he permitted a whimsical idea, to enter his head. He raised his face toward the summer moon and laughed.

Why not? To approach the affair from a novel and unexpected angle; no winding in and out, no foreground to traverse with hesitant step. To take the plunge without bothering to feel the water with his fingers. The idea appealed to all that was romantic in him.

Her name was Elizabeth Mansfield, and they probably called her Betty. She was also the daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield. That put a double wall around her, millions and social prestige; tremendous obstacles which should have frightened him and chilled his ardor, whereas they but filled him with elation.

This young man was a crusader, with an ideal quite as lofty as that of Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless. He did not sally forth joyously with chanting and banners; he would not have gone forth at all but for the white honesty of his soul. He had inherited this obligation; it had been thrust upon him without asking his leave. He was a Crusader by force of circumstance.

As he climbed into his bunk there was but one idea in his head—to carry the outpost, her father, by storm. Two things were possible; either Mansfield would listen or he would call for a deck steward. Anyhow, to put it to the touch!

* * * * * * *

Dunleigh Mansfield might have passed for an elderly beau in a Pinero drama; a fine, courtly figure of a man, with a cold, hawklike countenance, quite handsome, with scarcely a gray hair in his head, though he was fifty.

He was standing alone, that sunny morning, in the corner where the cross-rail joins the port.

"Mr. Mansfield?"

The iron magnate turned. He saw a hatless young man in a white cotton shirt, open at the throat, shiny blue serge trousers that bagged at the knees, and a pair of soiled tennis shoes.

"I am Mr. Mansfield"—coldly.

"I wish the honor of paying court to your daughter."

Mansfield was not quite sure he had heard aright. "I beg your pardon?"

The young man repeated his astounding request.

Stormy words burned the tip of Mansfield's tongue, but he pressed them back because the face he looked into was quite as handsome and hawklike as his own. Human faces were Dunleigh Mansfield's books. He recognized this type; the brow and eye of a dreamer, the nose and jaw of a fighting man.

"I Am Mr. Mansfield."

But Betty?—he asked the honor to pay court to Betty? The infernal impudence! The thing was to get rid of the bounder without creating a scene.

"You don't look insane, young man. Are you offering me a pleasantry?"

"No, Mr. Mansfield. I was never more serious."

"You have perhaps met me somewhere, and I have forgotten?"

"I have never met you before."

"You have met my daughter, then?"

"I have only seen her twice."

"Ah!" said Mansfield, as if this information cleared the air considerably. This was some kind of a joke, possibly a fool wager. Why not temporize and find out what lay behind this weird encounter?

"You might tell me something about yourself, before we proceed," he suggested.

The young man sensed the irony, the mockery. Two little points of fire appeared in his eyes.

"I am called Brandon Cathewe. By profession I am a writer." He hesitated for a moment. "I have a little money."

"A writer—with a little money. I should say that that was quite fortunate."

Suddenly there leaped into Mansfield's cold brain an idea, savage and ironic. Later he and Betty would have a hearty laugh over this idea. The impulent bounder!

"Brandon Cathewe," he mused. "That has an Irish ilt. So you wish to pay court to my daughter—object, matrimony?"

"With your permission."

"It is needless to ask if you are in love with my daughter."

"Quite needless. I am."

"The result of one meeting?"

"I have a happy faculty of knowing what I want."

"And of getting it?"—mockingly.

"Not always, to be sure, but generally. No doubt it sounds ridiculous to you; but the two times I have seen your daughter convince me that she is the one woman. Her beauty is the least of her."

An odd statement, thought Mansfield. "You have heard of the city of Bannister?"

"Very few people in America have not."

"Very good. I grant you permission to pay court to my daughter—conditionally. I'll waive my right to inquire about your family and your bank accounts. My terms are, Go to Bannister and make good; then come to me. I will introduce you personally to my daughter, provided she is not married by that time. Until you make good, you are not to seek to meet her. She is not to know that such a person as—er—Brandon Cathewe exists. I don't mean just making some money. By making good, I mean that you must become a force in Bannister. On the other hand, I am not going to keep my daughter locked up until you arrive. Those are the conditions," concluded Mansfield, very well pleased with himself.

"And I accept."

"You—what?"

"Accept! But on your part you must agree to give me fair play."

"Fair play?" Why, the bounder did not see the joke! "What do you mean by fair play?"

"You will say nothing to your daughter of this interview. I have come to you frankly and honorably, and I ask you measure for measure. If my conduct—my approach—seems outlandish, bizarre, it is because I am not afraid to ask for something I desire. I love your daughter, crazy as the statement may seem. I'm no fool. Your first impulse was to throw me over the rail. Being a gentleman, you reconsidered. You would punish my impertinence by placing insurmountable obstacles in front of me. I have accepted these conditions. If I fail, you will never hear of me. Good morning!"

The young man seized the companion-ladder rails and swung himself to the main deck without touching the steps. Immediately he disappeared.

Can Brandon make the grade? What's he going to do? What will be his first move?

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Skunk's Combat With Crows Unequal Match

How one skunk staged a battle with a flock of crows and was worsted by them on a floating cake of ice in Weiser river is told by a rancher living near Weiser, Idaho. His attention was attracted by the uproar of the crows and he watched the battle for some time, says the Milwaukee Journal.

The birds were apparently excited by the skunk's proximity. Occasionally a crow would lose control of itself and fall into the water and drown. As the ice floe floated nearer the battle grew in intensity.

The crows were fierce in their attacks but the skunk was just as fierce, using not only his claws but apparently also his poison gas equipment. He would dart his best weapon into the eyes of his assailants and there would be one less crow to combat.

Gas supplies finally gave out and the unequal battle ended when several of the birds alighted on the floe and picked out the skunk's eyes. As the floe drifted out of sight the skunk was stretched feebly on his side, with the crows picking vigorously at him. The rancher counted more than a dozen dead crows in the stream.

Glass Jug Lamp Base

A gallon glass cider jug makes a very good lamp base and with its handle is very easy to move about. The jug can be decorated on the inside to make it look unusual by pouring in for example a black paint and stirring it around vigorously. When this has dried, pour in a green paint and stir it around. The effect will be most attractive.

Naked Truth

"This is a cynical world, when viewed through the eyes of the modern child," said David Starr Jordan. "Children have a way of presenting the truth about their elders with ghastly clarity.

"Quite recently, when I boarded a train in San Francisco, a family group took the two seats in front of me. They spent several minutes in adjusting themselves but at last were settled. At this moment the little girl of the family stuck her head out the window and said to a group of friends on the platform:

"'We'll be gone in a minute and then you can talk about us and we'll talk about you.'"

The KITCHEN CABINET

(©, 1926, Western Newspaper Union.)

The buoyancy of health is real enjoyment. Strength, mental vigor, vivacity, and good nature spring from good digestion; good digestion is secured only from eating and drinking proper quantities of food and liquid. It is possible to enjoy buoyancy of spirit and good appetite every day.

EVERYDAY GOOD THINGS

When you don't know what to have for luncheon or supper, try:

Spanish Toast.—Cut up two green peppers, add a slice of onion, two sprigs of parley minced, and a cupful of thick tomato sauce. Simmer the mixture until smooth. Toast rounds of bread, butter and put a spoonful of the tomato mixture on each round of toast with a poached egg on top.

Fish Balls.—Make a white sauce using one tablespoonful of butter, one of flour, with salt and pepper to taste, one-half cupful of milk, and two well-beaten eggs. Cook until smooth, then stir in the flaked fish. Drop this batter by spoonfuls into hot fat. Drain on brown paper and serve at once.

Ham and Hominy.—When there is a bit of ham left from dinner, mince it and add it to cooked hominy which has been fried in ham fat, adding minced onion or parsley to the mixture; serve hot.

Haricot of Mutton.—Fry two tablespoonfuls of onion in two tablespoonfuls of drippings, add one and one-half pounds of mutton cut into two-inch pieces, salt and pepper well and cover with boiling water. Cook slowly until the meat is tender. Serve with buttered lima beans.

Apple and Marshmallow Dessert.—Peel, quarter and slice six juicy apples. Have ready one-third cupful of seedless raisins, one cupful of sugar. Arrange the apples and raisins with the sugar in layers in a buttered baking dish, add one-fourth of a cupful of water, cover and bake in a moderate oven until the apples are tender. Brush with butter and arrange marshmallows an inch apart over the apples. Place in the oven long enough to plump and brown the mallows. Serve with cream.

Cocoa Angel Food.—Sift one cupful of sugar with one-fourth cupful of cocoa. Beat the whites of a cupful of eggs until stiff, add one-fourth of a teaspoonful of cream of tartar to the eggs and another fourth to three-fourths of a cupful of flour. Fold in the sugar and cocoa, then the flour, adding a bit of salt and a teaspoonful of flavoring of vanilla.

A lemon, custard or cream pie is made more attractive and tasty with a few marshmallows dotted over the top of the pie or set into the meringue and browned with it.

Club Luncheon.

This is the time of the year when much entertaining is being done. While the budget for these affairs is frequently limited, yet it is possible with careful planning to serve delicious luncheons for a very small outlay.

In cold weather there should always be a hot course, either soup or a hot entree with cold meat, potato chips, pickles, rolls, jelly and a dessert. One may serve a fruit cup, sliced smoked tongue, scalloped potatoes, rolls, jelly, olives and dessert. For hot dishes, baked beans, macaroni and cheese, celery cooked and served with cheese sauce, candied sweet potatoes—any one goes nicely with sliced cold meat, tongue or meat loaf or with hot frankfurters. If the meal starts with a cupful of good broth a heavy nourishing salad will take the place of meat, then follow with dessert. The following are a few quantity recipes which will assist in preparing a menu for several:

California Salad Dressing.—Take three-fourths of a cupful of orange juice, one-fourth cupful of lemon juice, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of sugar, three eggs and two cupfuls of cream. Heat the fruit juices, add salt and sugar and eggs lightly beaten, stirring and cooking in a double boiler. When thick, cool, and just before serving add the cream whipped until stiff. This recipe makes one quart of dressing.

Sunflower Salad.—Peel eighteen oranges and separate into sections. Stone fifty dates and chop with one-half cupful of nut meats. Arrange the orange sections petalwise on lettuce, using three heads ordinary size; place a ball of the date mixture in the center of each flower. Use the mayonnaise or any desired salad dressing. This amount serves twenty-five.

Fruit Salad.—Take eight oranges, six bananas, three apples and one can of pineapple. Cut and mix as usual with the above dressing. Serves twenty-five.

Cottage cheese and pear, pear and tomato, stuffed dates with cottage cheese, canned pineapple and pear, all make delicious salads.

A molded vegetable or meat salad is always welcome and when molded always looks well and serves easily and in uniform portions. It may be molded in one large receptacle or mold and cut into uniform sizes.

Lesson for December 12

THE BOY SAMUEL

LESSON TEXT—I Sam. 3:10, 15-19.

GOLDEN TEXT—Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Boy Samuel.

JUNIOR TOPIC—God Calls the Boy Samuel.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—The Boyhood of a Great Leader.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Hearing and Heeding God's Voice.

In order to grasp the story of Samuel's boyhood life, a survey should be made of I Samuel, ch. 1-3.

I. Samuel Given in Answer to Prayer (I Sam. 1:19, 20).

The name Samuel means "asked of God." He was given to Hannah in answer to her prayers. In connection with her asking this gift from God, she vowed to give him to God. He was to be therefore a Nazarite all the days of his life.

II. Samuel Given to the Lord (I Sam. 1:24-28).

For a time he was cared for by his mother in the home. The best nurse and teacher for a child is its mother. According to her vow when she asked the Lord for this child, at an early age she took him to the sanctuary and gave him over to the charge of Eli, the priest, to minister in the sanctuary.

III. Features of Israel's History in This Period (2:12-36).

1. The demoralized priesthood.

(1) They were actuated by greed (2:12-17).

It was God's will that those who ministered at the altar should live of the things of the altar, but they broke through the divine regulations touching this matter, even to securing their selfish ends by force.

(2) Gross immorality (2:22).

The courts of God's house were thus polluted. The condition of the nation was most appalling: Degradation and ruin follow rapidly when God's ministers are under the sway of lust and greed.

2. An alienated people (2:30-32).

Their sins separated them from God. God's holiness is such that those who practice sin are alienated from Him.

3. The cessation of divine revelation (3:1).

The Word of God was precious in those days. "There was no open vision." This shows that God was silent. The message from the Lord was more a memory than a present experience. The same thing in principle is true of the individual life today. Some who once enjoyed fellowship with God no longer hear His voice speaking to them.

IV. God Called Samuel (3:2-10).

In striking contrast with the degeneracy of the nation, we have before us the beautiful life of Samuel. Dwelling within the sacred courts and ministering before the Lord with Eli is the innocent Samuel who is become the savior of his people. In Samuel we have a striking pattern of child religion. The Lord gave him in answer to Hannah's prayer. From his birth he was dedicated to the Lord. While quite young his mother took him to the sanctuary of the Lord where he served and slept. Two traits in Samuel's character stand out in this call, namely, his cheerful obedience to the Lord's call and his surrendered will. He expressed his willingness before he knew what was required. He did not inquire what was wanted and then let his obedience depend upon its suiting him. We should believe that the Lord knows what is best and be willing to yield glad obedience to His commands.

V. Samuel's First Prophetic Message (3:11-18).

Up to this time Samuel obeyed the one who was over him, but the time had now come when he must directly hear and obey the Lord. The first message entrusted to him was a most terrible one. To deliver it was a most trying task. He hesitated to tell it to Eli, but when pressed by him he manifested the true courage which was lying back of his fear. It must have been a bitter experience to Eli to see Samuel recognized and himself passed by, but he was submissive. He knew that the slight was just. He could not fail to interpret it thus in view of the appearance of the man of God to him (2:27-36). This fearful visitation upon Eli's house was due to the sins of his sons. He was held accountable for not restraining them.

VI. Samuel Established in the Prophetic Office (3:19-21).

"And Samuel grew and the Lord was with him and did let none of His words fall to the ground and all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord."

KEEP COUGHS OUT OF "DANGER ZONE"

Coughing irritates your throat and makes you cough more. The more you cough the harder it is to stop. And when you feel the cough spreading down into your bronchial tubes it is nearing the "danger zone"—for these tubes lead directly into your lungs.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral stops coughs quickly—almost instantly in spasmodic attacks. With the very first swallow you feel its comforting warmth. Real medicine, reaching deep down with its soothing, healing power. Absorbed through and through the irritated throat, chest and bronchial membranes, it quickly stops the cough, breaks up the cold and brings prompt, lasting relief.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is hospital-proved. Prescribed by physicians. Pleasant to taste. All druggists—60c and, twice the quantity, $1.00.

Parent-Teacher Association

The "Health Program" meeting last Friday night proved to be the best meeting of the year in both interest and attendance. The County Health Nurse, Miss Sweeney, briefly outlined her work, her interest in our school children and her desire to co-operate with us in our work of child welfare.

The address of Dr. Schweitzer, of Indianapolis, was not only highly pleasing in her manner of delivery but was most instructive to parents on the prevention of diseases peculiar to children.

The musical part of the program furnished by Miss Gallahan and Mr. Ramsey, the latter accompanied by Martha Miser, was appreciated as being a high class of music faultlessly rendered.

The chairman of the membership committee announced that our membership now numbers 126.

CORN CLUB MAKES A RECORD YIELD

The Spencer Township Corn Club, composed of the following boys have completed their work with the following yields:—

Frederick Laub	73.61 bu per acre
Harry Farver	69.00 bu per acre
Howard Beams	67.56 bu per acre
Richard Andrews	44.42 bu per acre
Virgil Laux	57.96 bu per acre
Albert Baltz	56.90 bu per acre
Maurice Miller	44.42 bu per acre

Total 431.06 bu. on seven acres.

The average yield was 61.5 bu. per acre. This club started last spring with eight members. Four club meetings have been held during the year in connection with the other Four H Clubs of the township. These boys are now busy selecting a ten ear exhibit for the County Club Show at Auburn, Dec. 14-18. This club expects to exhibit also at the Farmers Institute to be held at St. Joe this winter.

BLAME BAD ASSOCIATIONS FOR WRONG ACTS

The question "why boys go wrong," has been answered by 444 boys who ought to know. They are inmates of Elmira reformatory and gave the following answers to the question of what caused their downfall:

Bad associations, 35 per cent.
Easy money, 18 per cent.
Lack of funds to entertain girls, 12 per cent.
Liquor, 11 per cent.
Lack of home discipline, 9 per cent.
Lack of employment, 7 per cent.
Poolrooms, 6 per cent.
Laziness, 5 per cent.
Corner gangs, 4 per cent.
Gambling, 4 per cent.

TRAINMEN GIVEN SUBSTANTIAL RAISE

The first decison made by the board of arbitration operating under the new Watson-Parker railroad bill, given out today at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel, awarded 89,000 conductors and trainmen on eastern railroads an increase of 7½ per cent in wages, or approximately $15,000,000 a year.

The employes had asked approximately fifty roads for wage increases of 19 per cent, or $38,000,000 a year, amounting to a raise of about $1 a day. The advance averages about 42 cents a day per employe.

Caves of Elephanta

Not far from Bombay, India, are the famous caves of Elephanta. Elephanta is an island long held as a sacred place by orientals. The name was given by the Portuguese from a colossal sculpture of an elephant. A series of subterranean temples are hewn right out of the solid rock. Columns of the natural rock are left standing to support the roof, says the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Kite-Flying in the East

The flying of kites is still a national pastime with the Chinese, Japanese, Koreans and Indians. The framework is usually of bamboo strips, covered with thin silk or rice paper. In the Malay peninsula kites seldom have tails. In some parts of Asia they are made with perforated reeds, so that when they float and dip in the air a mournful wailing rises and falls.

Dreams and Action

The Man With Three Names

By HAROLD MACGRATH

Most men are dreamers, more or less, but some have the ability to translate their dreams into action. These are the ones who achieve. Here is the highly interesting tale of a dreamer who saw immense practicality behind his visions and proceeded to put it into effect. One of his methods was to make enemies where prudence would have dictated the making of friends. Mad, impractical, worse than tilting at windmills it seemed, but note the results.

Room for Christmas

By Frank L. Stanton, in Atlanta Constitution

I.

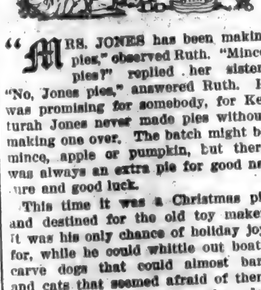
WELCOME, Mister Christmas!
Here is where we live,
With room for you, and always
Just all you have to give.
Come in! The fire's burning
And fine the table's set,
And hear us sing the old song:
"This life's worth living yet!"

II.

Welcome, Mister Christmas!
We love you more and more
When we see you on the threshold
Of the dwellings of the poor.
You bring the weary wanderers
From where their feet may roam
To the fight, and cheer and comfort
Of all our hearts at home!

The Old Toymaker

By Christopher G. Hazard.



"MRS. JONES has been makin' pies," observed Ruth. "Mince pies?" replied her sister. "No, Jones pies," answered Ruth. It was promising for somebody, for Keturah Jones never made pies without making one over. The batch might be mince, apple or pumpkin, but there was always an extra pie for good nature and good luck.

This time it was a Christmas pie and destined for the old toy maker. It was his only chance of holiday joy, for, while he could whittle out boats, carve dogs that could almost bark and cats that seemed afraid of them, and make doll houses, he could not cook, and he lived alone.

He was an old man, queer but kindly. His old house seemed to be falling down, or at least it was leaning that way, but yet it sheltered the toy shop bravely and tried to feel as young as ever because it had seen old Hans stand on his head just to show how young he was. On the way to him with the pie the children wondered if he would sing for them again as he had done the last time they watched him at his work. It was the song about the miller's dog that they wanted, but they found him working on a toy horse, and when they noticed that there was something wrong about the horse they forgot about the dog. "You haven't got that right, Mr. Hans," said Ruth; "you shouldn't put a necklace of sleigh bells arbund his stomach." "Well, well," said the old man, "I'll have to see about that; but perhaps I was thinking about something to eat when I put the bells in the wrong place." "Well, here it is," said Ruth, uncovering the pie, "and we wish you a Merry Christmas." "Sure," said Mr. Hans, "sure it will be merry, and you shall be merry, too," and he took down a bundle as he put the pie upon the shelf.

It was a very interesting bundle, but the children suddenly remembered the song and forgot the bundle. This was the song:

The miller's big dog lay on the mill floor,
And Bango was his name, oh.
A wondering what he lay there for,
And why he was so lame, oh.
B-a-n-g-ooo
O Bango was his name.

The miller he said if the dog was dead,
Why: that would be the end, oh;
But since he only lame instead,
Old Hans would soon him mend, oh.
B-a-n-g-ooo
O Bango was his name.

The special fun of it was when they spelled the dog's name around the circle, each singer taking one letter, and then all joining in on the last line.

Then the children forgot the song and remembered the bundle. It was well wrapped, for they took off paper after paper, like peeling an onion, until they came to the girl doll that could call for mother and the boy doll that could play on a mouth organ. Then, with both the presents going, they also went, leaving a pleasant smile on the old man's face and all the toys looking happily at each other.

Mrs. Jones welcomed the travelers back with a taste of her cooking for themselves, and was as happy as all good Christmas cooks are. She said, "You can't make chocolate almonds out of horse chestnuts, but those youngsters surely did put in their thumbs and pull out plums."

VOL. XL ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1926 NUMBER 50

BUTLER BOY KILLED SATURDAY WHILE HUNTING

Ralph Davis, aged 15, of Butler, is dead from gun shot wounds received Saturday morning at 10:30 while hunting near Butler. Death was instantaneous. He was shot in the heart and through the left shoulder as he stepped from behind a shock of corn at the moment Carl Oberlin, aged 14, son of Lott Oberlin of Butler, shot at a rabbit. With the two boys was Dean Rinehart, aged 15 years, also of Butler. He is a son of Ezra Rinehart.

The three boys were hunting in a field northeast of Butler at the time of the accident. After the shooting the Johnson undertaking establishment at Butler was notified and Young Davis was removed to the mortuary where Coroner A. N. Adams of Auburn held an inquest Saturday afternoon. Before the arrival of the coroner, Dr. L. H. Harrison of Butler, was called and pronounced the boy dead.

The accident victim was one of six children. His mother, Mrs. Lewis Davis, is a widow. Four boys and one girl are left in the family.

According to the story of the boys who were hunting with Young Davis, a rabbit had been tracked to a corn shock and was thought to have hidden in the shock. Davis was back of the shock and evidently stepped out from behind it just as Oberlin's gun was discharged. Davis, from the other boy's statement gave one scream and fell over.

Coroner Adams completed his inquest late Saturday afternoon and gave a verdict of accidental shooting and death. Coroner Adams found in his investigation that the boys, all in the seventh grade in school had hunting licenses. Young Davis was shot with a 16 guage barreled shot gun in the heart and his left arm at the shoulder was nearly severed.

"40 AND 8" ELECT OFFICERS FOR YEAR

VOTES COST $1.15 IN DEKALB COUNTY

DeKalb county's investment in each vote cast in the general election November 2 was approximately $1.15.

The expense of the primary was $4,550, the registration $650, and the election itself $5,000, a total of $11,200. The number of votes cast was 9,400.

The total expense in 1924 was approximately the same as this year, but there were more than 11,000 votes cast, making the average cost only a dollar a vote. In 1920 the average cost was 90 cents and in 1922 it was 98 cents.

Among the bills allowed for the election by the county commissioners at their December term were $75 each to Dr. E. O. Hall and Miles Barter, election commissioners, and $100 to J. Harvey Knauer, county clerk, for his services as election commissioner. The pay for the precinct inspectors was $12 each, for judges and clerks $9 and for the sheriffs $6. While in some cases 75 cents was asked for meals for the election board members, only 60 cents was allowed. In some precincts only 50 cents was asked and allowed.

Some of the taxing units sent bills for rental of public buildings used as voting places, but these were not allowed, the commissioners paying only for the rental of privately-owned property.

VISITS ICE CREAM, BUTTER FACTORY AT PLYMOUTH

Ye editor and wife spent from Friday evening until Sunday afternoon at Etna Green, Ind., visiting in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Renner. They like their school fine and have splendid equipment with which to carry on thier work as well as the sports, a new gym being completed for the school term.

On Saturday afternoon we drove to Plymouth and while there called on Dr. Walter Schlosser, who is engaged in the manufacture of Oak Grove butter and ice cream of different kinds. We were taken through the plant and given a lesson in butter making. The ice cream industry is growing by leaps and bounds and to meet their demands over 80 different kinds are manufactured. As we passed through this department were given samples of ice cream and chocolate coated ice cream bars. The methods used were interesting and very sanitary. Every mixture is tested in the laboratory to see that it meets the required standard as given by Schlosser products.

While our stay here was short, we were glad of the opportunity to see how these products were made, as all of them are sold in St. Joe.

Upon leaving the plant, we were given a cake of brick ice cream for our evening meal, and this was appreciated.

Dr. Schlosser sends his regards to all inquiring St. Joe friends.

C. O. KRISE IN RACE FOR POSTOFFICE

A movement has started among a number of Auburn republicans for the appointment of Charles O. Krise as postmaster. Mr. Krise has been suggested as a compromise candidate between Milo Garrett, the present postmaster and L. L. Daniel, who was the republican party's candidate for county auditor at the recent election.

While Mr. Garrett has been recommended by Congressman David Hogg for re-appointment for a four year term and the nomination has been forwarded to Postmaster General New, local republicans opposed to his appointment are making an effort to have the confirmation of his appointment delayed. Mr. Garrett's term expires on March 1 of next year.

Mr. Krise has been a member of the postal force at the local office for ten years and is well acquainted with the work of the office.—Star.

Where Old Santa Comes From

THE YULETIDE HERO

BY CLARION R. REAGAN

SAM HEATON decided it was high time he did something—something big. Here he was on the far side of forty, no money, no social position—for chauffeurs were little more than servants, he thought—and no wife or family. He was even in more desperate straits. He was enamoured of the young widow, a woman about thirty-six, for whom he was working. He was alternately taken with fits of despair and hope about Mrs. Allan. More frequently it was despair, however, for he couldn't imagine anyone so charming and so rich as Mrs. Allan caring anything for him. But there were times when she smiled at him with special graciousness and talked to him for a longer time than was actually necessary for the transaction of the business in hand, and his hopes rose. After all many women had married their chauffeurs.

He was not bad looking. In fact he had always had a reputation for being something of a Beau Brummel. He comforted himself with the thought that there were worse men, certainly.

Christmas was approaching and he racked his brain to know how he could buy Mrs. Allan something that would really be worthy of her. He carefully gathered together every cent he had in the world—sixty dollars—and bought a neat little watch he had noticed in a nearby jeweler's window.

Christmas Eve he called at the jeweler's for his purchase, put the little package safely in his pocket, and started off into the crowded street. At the corner some one was making a speech. There was an enormous number of people gathered, and it was difficult to pass. Finally Heaton reached the other side of the street, and continued his walk. He put his hand into his pocket to warm it a little and was shocked to find—could it be possible?—the little package—gone! Wildly he ran back through the crowd, looking on the street for it and asking people if they had seen it. Of course it was all useless. It was merely the usual case of the Christmas time pickpocket. He was insanely angry. He must have it. It meant everything to him. Ordinarily the most honest man in the world, he was completely overcome with the desire to get back—in any way—the equivalent of what he had lost. Someone had robbed him; he would rob somebody else.

A little ahead of him he saw a well-dressed woman, her arms full of packages. Without thinking, he went straight towards her, to slip one of them. Simultaneously another man was seized with the same idea. Their hands met. The woman turned sharply. The other man had the package in his hand. Heaton struck him in the face and a fight followed, a fight in which Heaton pursued, the other trying to flee. The woman, panicky, was screaming for the police. Soon several policeman appeared and the man was caught. Heaton forgot that he, too, had been trying to rob the woman. To everyone, even to himself, his case was clearly that of the righteous man pursuing the evil.

At the police station, Heaton for the first time came face to face with the robbed woman. They both registered surprise.

"Mrs. Allan!"

"Oh, Mr. Heaton, it was you, then, who so nobly helped me. I'm so grateful!" She was weak from the excitement of the adventure and leaned comfortably on Heaton's arm.

The thief was given a preliminary hearing. Examination showed he had a whole pocketful of articles he had taken in the crowd. Among the things found was the little watch Heaton had bought for Mrs. Allan.

"I shall have the jeweler who sold me that prove it is mine," said Heaton when he saw it, "or rather yours," he added, turning to Mrs. Allan. "It was to have been your Christmas gift."

"Oh, how wonderful of you," exclaimed Mrs. Allan, her eyes showing clearly how much she thought of the gift, and more of the giver.

They say the gossips talked quite a little when some weeks later they learned that Mrs. Allan had married her chauffeur. But they say, too, that the couple were so completely happy they didn't mind the talking a bit.

GIFTS AT CHRISTMAS

GIFTS at Christmas time were common in medieval times. Accounts tell of the chandlers' guild sending out gratis to every one a special sort of candles which were burned with the Yule log to light the houses for the coming of a supernatural visitor. Bakers also sent out "Yule cakes." Gradually the sentiment of "Peace on earth, good will to men" and the celebration of the spirit by general gifts seems to have spread through the other guilds, and finally to have become general.

Strenuous Eviction

There are old sayings about scuttling a ship or burning a barn to get rid of rats, but it has been reserved for a landlord at Livera in France to tear down his house to get rid of human tenants. This landlord, a mason by trade, let his house to working people with whom he did not get on well and whom he vainly tried to evict. Finally the tenants returning home one evening found that a kitchen wall had been demolished. A notice was posted upon the wreckage stating that this was only the beginning of operations. This act of eviction, it is said, proved effective.

Julius H. Tuttle, librarian of the Massachusetts Historical society, says that so far as he can learn there was no known relationship between Daniel and Noah Webster. Daniel Webster, the great statesman and orator, who was born at Salisbury, N. H., January 18, 1782, was descended from Thomas Webster who first appeared in Watertown, Mass., in 1688. Noah Webster, of dictionary fame, who was born in Hartford, Conn., October 16, 1758, was descended from John Webster, one of the first settlers of Hartford in 1636. VELVET HATS MOST POPULAR; SHORT JACKET SUIT OF VELVET

IT IS a gay velvet vogue which the mode is leading this season. As the midwinter styles continue to arrive from across seas, it is more and more evident that velvet has completely cast its spell of enchantment over the world of fashion. The "last word" from Paris declares that we shall be velvet gowned, velvet cloaked and velvet hatted.

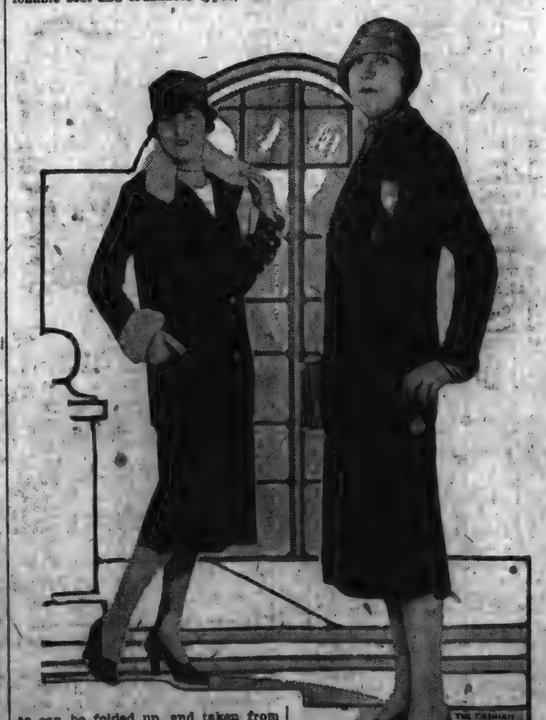
By way of adding emphasis to this style message, French milliners are creating bewitching toques and close-fitting hats, conjured in inimitable fashion, all of velvet. Every hat in this picture is a Paris creation, and each is of velvet.

An enthusiasm for velvet of short jacket styling is rapidly o'erspreading the French capital. Foremost couturiers are giving emphasis to this mode by creating youthful models which have either the scant wrap-around skirt or probably a fan-shaped pleating at the front. These they top with boyish looking coats, hip-length or just below, either double-breasted tuxedo or buttoning down the front.

Not only is the black velvet tailleur smartly Parisian, but handsome colors are just as much so. It is Lucien Lelong who creates a youthful tailored two-piece suit of marine blue velvet, as pictured here to the left. It is cunningly collared and cuffed with ermine. The buttons are of sparkling cut steel. There is a matching hat of the velvet trimmed with a wide band of grosgrain. In some instances the velvet hat accompanying the velvet suit blends rather than matches, which is an outcome of fashion's latest caprice—two-toned velvet effects. That is, the hat may be a darker or a lighter color tone than that of the suit.

From Jenny comes a fetching version of the black velvet tailleur. It is shown to the right in the picture. There is a poplin braid binding and the two-button fastening to the left front. Underneath is a lovely gay blouse of cloth of gold. Indeed that is always and ever a part of the velvet ensemble—a metal fabric or embroidered blouse. The enticing thing about the short jacket velvet tailleur is that the suit always impresses one with its youthful aspect, also its correct appearance for daytime and outdoor wear. Yet in an instant it may be transformed into the dressiest of effects, charmingly tuned to bridge party or afternoon tea by removing the coatee and revealing a blouse of pronounced elaboration.

Latest in the Milliners' Art.



Two Designs From Paris.

As can be folded up, and taken from one's overnight bag looking as perfect as before. It is achieved of brown velvet, its sole decoration being a galalith buckle which clasps the down-turned top above the right ear.

Another interesting millinery creation, as pictured at the bottom of this group to the right, owes its attractiveness to the employment of blue velvet in its development. This is stitched in loop effect with band of king's blue ribbon and silver buckle.

In the combination of toque and shoulder capelet of black velvet, which centers this group, Louise Marny achieves something out of the ordinary in the way of an ensemble. There is an embroidery of mystic crescents and other conventional motifs done in gold with old rose.

FARM POULTRY

SANITATION PAYS CHICKEN RAISERS

Illinois farmers, who took big strides toward more profitable pork production by adopting swine sanitation, are now finding that sanitation pays just as well around the chicken lot as it does with pigs. To further the idea, poultry specialists of the college of agriculture, University of Illinois mapped out a workable system of poultry sanitation and already many chicken raisers of the state are profiting as a result of it.

There's the case of B. A. Barker, a Grundy county farmer, for instance, who took up the poultry sanitation idea and thereby put a stop to the heavy losses which he had been taking as a result of tapeworms and other poultry parasites and diseases. In connection with the sanitation system, Barker yarded his old hens for the first time this past year and as a result the egg production of the flock was more uniform throughout the summer than it had been in previous years, due to the fact that the hens were uniformly fed. Under this plan they always had access to mash but were not allowed to overeat on grain. Barker has co-operated with the agricultural college in its poultry flock record project for three years.

In putting the poultry sanitation plan into practice on his farm, Barker had his flock tested for tuberculosis. It also was pronounced free of bacillary white diarrhea, one of the worst of the many chick diseases. The old yard where most of the chicks had been raised before was turned into a garden and the chicks this past year raised on fresh ground which was sown to oats and rape. During the summer the rape provided shade as well as green feed. A movable brooder house was used.

C. H. Wilke, a McLean county farmer, is another Illinois poultryman who has profited as a result of following a definite system of poultry sanitation.

Wilke, who is co-operating with the extension service of the agricultural college in keeping records on his chickens, took off a hatch of 437 chicks in March and placed them on clean ground where no chicks had ever been raised before. The ground happened to be in a corn field. In line with the sanitation system which he was practicing, Wilke used movable brooder houses. No signs of disease showed up in these chicks throughout the entire season and 190 pullets were taken from the bunch and placed in winter quarters. They were plump and ready to lay.

Wilke's experiences with a batch of April chickens which were raised the old way are a striking contrast to the results which he obtained under the sanitation plan. There were 1,332 chicks in the batch that came off in April. They were raised in old chicken yards where hens had run before and where chicks had been raised in previous years. The result was that one disease alone, coccidiosis, wiped out 25 per cent of the chicks. Roup followed as a result of the weakened condition of the stock.

Feeding Soaked Bread Is Dangerous Practice

There is danger in feeding soaked bread to poultry, according to a writer in an exchange. Soaked bread, he says, is one of the worst things one can feed poultry, either young or old, as usually fed, but there is a way of feeding stale bread that transforms it into one of the best and cheapest poultry foods.

To do this cut the bread into slices and dry it over a stove or in the oven, until it is dry enough to crack; put the bread in a pail, or stout box, and chop it up with a spade.

When ready to feed, put a quantity of this in a pail, cover with hot water and pour water off in about one minute, then mix in enough mash so that it will crumble. For summer or winter feeding this cannot be beaten as an egg or flesh producer. The finer particles of bread left in the bottom of the box when chopping up the bread make an excellent food for small chicks and may be fed dry.

High Egg Production

In cold, severe mid-winter weather the winter-egg man gives attention to keeping his poultry house properly ventilated, as he knows from past experience that cold temperature and moist atmosphere do not go well with winter egg production. Too frequently, as cold weather comes, the poultryman begins to close the windows at night and pull down the curtains, which all goes to make matters worse, and causes marked decrease in egg flow.

Mating the Flocks

When mating the flocks, allow 8 to 10 hens of the heavy breeds, such as Brahmas or Langshans, 10 to 12 females of American breeds, such as Plymouth Rocks and Wyandottes, and 12 to 15 hens of the light breeds, as Leghorns and Anconas, to each male. Cockerels will care for more hens than cocks and fewer males are necessary if the flock enjoys free range. Eggs may be saved for hatching and will generally be found fertile two days after the males are introduced.

There seems to be a movement on foot to seek revision of state dry law, or in other words to pull some of the teeth in the Wright law, in Indiana. Those who will ask this revision think the punishment too severe. And wouldn't it be great for Indiana to loosen up on enforcement and the federal government taking steps to enforce the law by making appropriations?

New Kite Interests the Aero Experts

Shown to the public for the first time, after more than 200 trial "flights," this huge passenger-carrying kite is being studied by aero experts at Los Angeles. Invented by George A. Argabrite, who has flown kites since school days, it has been tested and so far has carried 186 pounds aloft. The photo shows Mrs. Argabrite in the kite.

Scene of Christmas Celebration

In a secluded little dell, high up on the slopes of the California Sierras, stands the General Grant tree, patriarch of the great grove of sequoias of General Grant National park. Around the base of this tree will gather at high noon on Christmas day men and women from far and near to observe the second annual "Nation's Christmas Tree" celebration. The General Grant tree is more than four thousand years old, towers 264 feet in the air, measures 106 feet around the base and its greatest diameter is 40 feet.

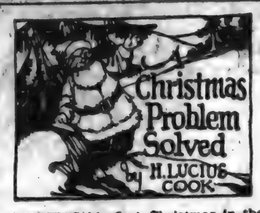
SENATOR FROM MAINE

Arthur R. Gould, Republican, who was elected United States senator from Maine to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Bert Fernald



IT WAS his first Christmas in the city. He could not afford to go home, nor could he have gone if he had had the money. He was clerk in a store, and had to work Christmas Eve till ten o'clock. The last train for his home town left at three in the afternoon. And there was no use going up on Christmas day for just an hour; five hours each way on the train, total fare over ten dollars, for one hour at home; one-third of a week's pay! No, that would be extravagance. So he had sent his mother two pink silk nightgowns as a solace for his first absence from home on Christmas day. He thought the nightgowns would delight her; she had never had a silk one, and from the way that silk ones were displayed in the city shops, he was sure they were the thing to wear. The night gowns he had sent her, the hankies he had sent his sisters, and the ties for his brothers, had completely emptied his pockets. He always had been generous, but he enjoyed depriving himself for the happiness of others. His generosity this time, however, had gone too far, for he had nothing left with which to buy a gift for Mrs. Addison.

Mrs. Addison was a young widow whom he had met recently in the city. She was a very beautiful woman, and had been most kind to him. He had already been to her small apartment several times to have supper with her and her jolly, foreign-acting father, and sometimes they had all gone to a "movie" together afterwards. But she had never let him pay for their tickets, and he had never done anything to recompense her for her kindness to him. "Your companionship is all we want, dad and I," is what she always said, and he believed her. But he really wanted to take her something nice for Christmas. If only he had kept one of the nightgowns he had sent his mother. But no, that would have been too pretentious and too personal. He must give her something very beautiful, to be sure, but nothing extravagant, even if he could. She wouldn't like that. What was he to do?

For lunch the day before Christmas he had a sandwich and a soda at a drug store. That left him 20 minutes to gaze longingly in the shop windows on the avenue. Such pretty things, he thought he had never seen before—jewelry, clothing, novelties for the delight of women. They seemed just made for Mrs. Addison. But a dollar was all the money he could spare, and what could you get for that? The boudoir lamp he wanted cost five dollars, the desk set eight; and even a decent box of candy would be two dollars and a half.

The jeweler's clock warned him he must get back to work, so wearily he turned the corner and hurried to his own store to so grudgingly dole out to others the things he could not buy himself—for her.

That night he returned to his room empty-handed and mournful. But his fatigue was so great, sleep soon quieted his sorrow.

It was late Christmas morning when he awoke, but there was still time to slick himself up and get to Mrs. Addison's for breakfast at eleven. How original of her to invite him for Christmas breakfast, and at eleven, too! He appreciated those extra hours of sleep. She certainly was a dear.

Breakfast at eleven! Why, that meant he would not have to eat again till night, and then just a simple supper. And THAT meant he saved the price of a Christmas dinner—another dollar! But two dollars—what could he do with that, and all the stores closed? His enthusiasm waned as quickly as it came. And then, suddenly, his eyes saw the beautiful flowers he was watering. They were paper white narcissus he had bought a few weeks before at the "five and ten." The four bulbs and the bowl had cost only a quarter, and here they were with two beautiful sprays of fragrant bloom and one fat bud just ready to break its covering. Their fragrance filled the room. Their beauty would grace any home; yea, even hers. His Christmas shopping problem was solved. He would buy some candy at the corner drug store, and give it with the flowers he had grown himself. Oh, what a jolly breakfast party they would have!

An Ill Omen

In the Balkans it is believed that to die on Christmas Day is of ill omen as regards one's place in the after-death life.

A Christmas Dish

Eels baked and rolled in laurel leaf are a favorite Christmas dish in Italy.

"THIS man says we are here for the night, and no way out of it. We're twenty-five miles from John's, too. Repairs will have to be brought four miles from Coaltown. Those huts down the hill belong to the Loneridge coal mines. The miners will have guests tonight," Mr. Long announced as he drew some tools from his automobile. The mine mechanic who had been procured when Mr. Long had walked to one of the shanties down the long winding hill when his car had refused to go, smiled and informed Mr. and Mrs. Long that he would find a place for them to stay for the night.

It was the afternoon before Christmas, when they were on their way to Mrs. Long's brother John's country home, where the Long children had gone the day before with Mrs. Long's sister's family, to be present at the family Christmas Eve festivities, with a large tree by the fireplace for the families of five brothers and sisters with parents of both Mr. and Mrs. Long. In the car were gifts not only for the Long children but for most of the other relatives. After telephoning from the mine-foreman's office to John's family that they must spend the night at Loneridge, the packages were carried to one of the better looking huts of the foreign-speaking folks who received them hospitably. During the evening, while the hostess was preparing the meal, the woman by means of signs and unintelligible English made Mrs. Long understand that there was little Christmas festivity in the mining town.

"This woman has shown me courtesy and kindness; here is an opportunity to prove some Christmas courage and character," Mrs. Long whispered to her husband as plans began percolating through her mind. Soon the children were helping decorate the small tree which Mrs. Long had brought from her husband's store for younger members of the relatives' families, as well as her own children. Mrs. Schalska popped corn, Christmas-tree trimmings, oranges, nuts, candy and candles were produced from among the packages in the car, and a hurried trip to a small store enlarged the stock of goodies. The children, taking turns in carrying the tree, with Mr. and Mrs. Schalska, Mr. and Mrs. Long started out. Every house with boys and girls, aged or sick ones, was visited. The tree was placed on a table or chair, candles lighted, for a moment while some goodies were distributed.

After a visit to each place, the family was invited to accompany this Christmas Cheer company while carols were sung outside and inside until everyone was so happy that some shouted while others cried for joy. One dear woman after listening to the story of the significance of the Yuletide season which some had made Mr. Long understand they wished to learn, drying her eyes on the corner of a faded apron, called Mrs. Long an "H-angel." The glad notes of the Christmas caroling soon reached the farther ends of Loneridge, whose inhabitants joined in a community Christmas as they made their way to the large engine house where the tree was placed in the center while they sang patriotic songs. Then, while sacred quietness reigned, Mrs. Long repeated the Christmas story, after which Mr. Long led softly in singing, "All is calm, all is bright," when some one touched Mrs. Long on the sleeve. It was her brother, John, who was waiting in his big car to take them to his home. After their own festivities he had slipped away to bring the stranded travelers as a surprise next morning to all but his wife. As Mrs. Long arranged the packages around the small tree on the table, possibly there were visions of happy faces of Loneridge boys and girls with their note discordant in tone but full of love-harmony while they sang, "All is bright." Perhaps she wondered at the "peace that passed understanding" which she had that Christmas. She may have understood that the Loneridge Christmas Eve would be one of the happiest memories of her life because wherever and whenever the message "Inasmuch" is lived out, there will be "Peace and Good Will Among Men."

A Christmas Carol

A bright and blessed Christmas Day,
With echoes of the angels' song,
And peace that cannot pass away,
And holy gladness calm and strong,
And sweet heart-carols flowing free:
This is my Christmas wish to thee!

DAIRY

BIG ADVANTAGES OF FALL CALVES

There are a number of advantages in having dairy calves dropped in the fall. Cows which freshen in the fall usually produce more milk than cows which freshen at other seasons of the year. Heifers are usually bred so that they will come in milk at two years of age. If they are fall calves they will mature at the proper season. Calves which are to be raised on skim milk can be kept growing nicely during the winter and turned out on pasture without checking their growth. The disadvantages of feeding and care in winter are more than offset by the annoyance from flies and hot weather which are experienced by the spring calves. In addition there is usually more time available for giving the calves proper attention in the winter.

Clean pails for feeding and clean barns for housing are two important essentials in raising the calves. The calves will need to have a stall or lot where they can get plenty of sunshine. If the calves are confined to a dirty, dark stall they are apt to become unthrifty.

Calves should have their mothers' milk when they are started on feed. Whole milk should be continued for the first month and gradually shifted to skim milk. The calves should be given grain as soon as they will eat it. If a little cracked corn is placed in the bottom of the milk pails the calves will soon acquire a taste for it. The amount of milk and grain should always be limited. Better results are obtained if the calves are kept hungry.

An abundance of clean water should be accessible at all times or available at frequent intervals. Good hay should be provided. Many people favor mixed hay for calves as it is less apt to cause scours than alfalfa hay. However, good results can be had in feeding alfalfa hay if it is fed in limited quantities so that the calves will not gorge themselves. If any scours appear, the hay should be changed and special attention paid to cleanliness of both the stalls and milk pails. Sanitation, feeding and housing are the important details in raising fall calves successfully.

Dairyman Gains Much by Better Feeding Methods

That ground corn and ground oats make a dairy cow ration that is far superior to broken ear corn has been strikingly demonstrated in the case of one Knox county (Ill.) dairy herd, says C. S. Rhode, dairy extension specialist of the college of agriculture, University of Illinois, who has charge of the county dairy herd improvement associations in the state. The owner of this Knox county herd increased his profits $27.74 during one month by changing from a feed of broken ear corn to one of ground corn and ground oats, Fred Shipley, tester in the county herd improvement association, reported. With the change in the ration came an increase in the average production of each cow for the month of 100 pounds of milk and 6.7 pounds of butterfat.

The ration was improved both by grinding the corn and by adding the ground oats, Rhode explained. The benefits of grinding in this case are in line with the results of experimental work and the experiences of practical dairymen, according to Rhode. Dairy cows are hard-working animals and they will give better results if such feeds as corn, oats and barley are given to them in the ground form, he added.

Twin Bulls Declared to Be Potent as Breeders

Will twin calves breed? This subject is often misunderstood. Twin bulls are as sure breeders as bulls of single birth and there is no reason to suspect failure to breed when a bull is twinned with another bull, says W. W. Swett of the Missouri College of Agriculture.

The same thing can be said of heifers that are twinned together. They are as sure to be breeders as any other heifers.

When a heifer and a bull are born together, the heifer is known as a free-martin. The bull, twinned with a heifer is as certain to be a breeder as a bull of single birth, but the free-martin heifer is almost sure to be sterile.

Only a very few free-martins have been known to breed, and the chances are very small that they will ever reproduce. As a rule it is not advisable to raise free-martin heifers as they usually result in failures and are worth no more than their beef value.

Effect of Big Storm

Dairymen who have kept milk records for a series of years well know the effect of a big storm on the producing herd. Invariably there is a severe shrink resulting from a cold, stormy winter period. To prevent this shrink requires some additional work on the part of the cow keeper. A herdsman who is able to prevent a shrink during a blizzard understands his business and deserves commendation, for he has proven that he is efficient in his work.

STORY FROM THE START

Brandon Cathewe, young writer, has bought a newspaper in Bannister as part of his plan in becoming a "force" in the town, which position he must attain if he is to court Betty, daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield, steel magnate of the town. Cathewe prints a story telling how Mansfield has defrauded a workman of a valuable invention, which has made Mansfield rich. Doctor Maddox learns that Cathewe is the son of Digby Hallowell. Nancy, the doctor's daughter, is Betty's chum, and together they read the article. Mansfield learns that Cathewe is the new editor.

Mansfield recalled what he could of that remarkable interview. Why, the fellow had caught the spirit of the jest, but had pinned the jester down to a gentleman's agreement.

Gone to Bannister, bought that semi-Socialist sheet, all with the idea of winning Betty! The fellow ought to be looked over by the commission in lunacy.

In one manner or another he must be driven out of Bannister, where he did not belong.

Mansfield's prerogatives had been encroached upon, and the encroacher must be punished, as an example and a warning to other editors that one man ruled the destinies of Bannister.

Suddenly he had it; and the illumination chilled him slightly. Reprisal! The whole affair on shipboard a blind, Betty a pretense.

The son of some man he had broken via Wall Street method. The affair now had sense and significance. Reprisal!

Very good. What he had meted out to the father he would mete out to the son!

* * * * * * *

I wish I had some new words to describe Nancy and Betty or that I could twist the old ones about in such a fashion as to make them look new! To have described these two young women a thousand years ago, when the language blocks were freshly painted!

Both of them had beauty. The beauty of one was cloudlike; a summer cloud, brilliantly white against the blue, changing subtly and continuously, mirrored on the stream—a serene beauty. Her lovely white arms were spread out on each side of her. Her skin, reflecting the firelight, was like a goldbeater's leaf, and there were magic threads of gold in the blue iris of her eye. Her hair was a ruddy brown, like the leaf of the copper-beech in October.

The other girl was resting her elbows on her knees, her chin in the cup of her palms. She was as pretty as a hollyhock; homesy, frank, and friendly. Good folks—a summer cloud and a hollyhock!

There was no continuity to Nancy Maddox's thoughts. They were like butterflies, wheeling and turning in a most wonderful garden.

These amazing two weeks in Washington! It seemed to her that she wasn't real, that in some mysterious fashion she had been incorporated between the covers of an English society novel. Ambassadors and diplomats, officers from all parts of the world, heroes and politicians! Men with brains to sell. And they danced with Nancy Maddox because she was Betty Mansfield's friend.

Betty! How they flocked about her, these men! She was like a whirlpool, drawing every one toward her, and quite as unconscious of her power as any real whirlpool. Nancy had learned a stupendous fact, that the great in soul are always simple and genuine. And this lovely girl at her side was totally free of artifice.

"Betty, you baffle me," Nancy said one night. "Sometimes I think I know you; then I'm sure I don't."

"How—why?"

"You are so beautiful that I find myself watching you constantly. And I can't get away from the idea that you are watching and waiting for something or someone. The eager way in which you greet new men! I thought at first it was one of those little tricks women use to trap men's interest. But not you. I have noticed that after you've talked a little while with a new man you leave him utterly bewildered by your sudden lack of interest."

"And so you have noticed! I wonder if others have? Nancy, have you ever been in love?"—rather intensely.

"I don't know, Betty. There is a young man in Bannister I'm very fond of. I'm afraid I am fonder than it is wise to be, since no act or word of his has ever carried him over the boundary line of friendship. He's the queerest boy! Merry and whimsical and shrewd; but sometimes I sense precipices in his soul, depths that I cannot see into. Father says he is the finest young man he ever met. But there! I'm not in love that I know of. It may happen, but I'm not going to let go until he gives me the right to."

Betty stood up. She swept a hand across her eyes. "Oh, I must tell someone, or go mad! I dare not tell daddy. Besides, he would not understand. He doesn't believe in 'Brushwood Boys.'" Betty suddenly dropped to her knees and seized the bewildered Nancy's hands. "Romance! Nancy, do I look like the kind—am I the kind—for any man to play with? I mean, is it right that any man should hurt and mock me when I have wittingly harmed no one? It isn't fair, it isn't fair! Love! As if one could say howdy-do to it and then good-by!"

"Betty, whatever has happened? I just knew that something was wrong. But there must be some mistake. No man would hurt and mock you intentionally."

Betty turned and sat on her heels, staring into the crumbling embers. She drew one of Nancy's hands down across her shoulder and held it tightly.

"Letters!—from the sky, the clouds, the stars, burning with fire. Oh, he must have loved me! He couldn't have written like that else. The first was beautifully written, full of poetry and music . . . and love. I read it and threw it into the empty grate. But I went back and recovered it. There was a phrase that kept singing through my head, and I wanted to see if I had interpreted it correctly. Well, I put the letter away."

Nancy laid her free hand on the beautiful hair and stroked it.

"Of course I wondered who and what he was. I had nearly forgotten the letter—a month later—when the second one came, quite as wonderful as the first, which I resurrected for comparison. They were absolutely unlike except in theme. That was love. No answer was expected, for there was neither name nor address. A month later the third letter came. And then I began to wait for them, eager and thrilled. For nearly three years they came, Paris, London, Cairo, direct, there was never any forwarding marks upon the envelopes. Some one who knew where I was, where I was going. That alone fascinated me!"

"From where were they mailed?"

"Always from New York. I carried an autograph album about and lots of young men have written their names in this album. But I never found the one handwriting I was in search of."

"But it would be easy to disguise that!"

"I made them write a paragraph with three or four sentences—quotations. It wasn't the writing; it was the style of punctuation by which they ended a sentence."

"I don't understand."

"I was hunting for a curious period—a little x instead of dot, such as you and I make. A man might change the style of his stroke, but habit would lure him into, making that odd little period, so I believed."

"And you never found it?"

"No. There was always a postscript to these letters. 'Some day I shall come to you.' Five months ago the letters ceased to come. What has happened? Is he dead? If alive, why doesn't he come to me? Nancy, I'm much afraid."

"Of what?"

"That he has created in my heart something that will always be there."

"Love?" whispered Nancy.

"I don't know what it is, but it is beginning to hurt dreadfully. At first, when I got a letter, it made me curiously happy. I'd sit down at the piano and sing happy songs. Now I can't play anything but sad ones. What is happening to me? Whatever can it mean? I'm afraid."

"He may be ill."

"He would have found some way of notifying me."

"He might be too old and afraid to come."

"Oh, Nancy, he is young—like I am! I know it. But if I could only stamp out the thought of him, free myself. I am watching and waiting and searching. I am always straining my ears for some sign. He doesn't come. And now he writes no more. Where and under what circumstances did he first see me? Have I really met him? Do I know him? What impelled him to write like that to me? No man would make sport of me. My brain is in a turmoil. I would have disobeyed father and remained in France but for the hope that if I came home I might meet this strange and unusual man. Nancy, I am hurt."

"Burn the letters," said Nancy, indignantly. "It is going back to them that holds you. Burn them. Cut the Gordian knot."

"I've tried . . . and I can't!"

CHAPTER IV

An Encounter.

On the sunny side of a huge bowlder, on the top of a rusty green hill, sat a man with a small book on his knees. He wore a gray flannel shirt, tieless; a pair of brown corduroy trousers, much the worse for wear; and a pair of ugly russet walking boots.

Eastward, several church spires were visible in the late September haze. There lay the city of Bannister. Nature, hating the ugly, hid it as well as she could. Farther east, a drab smudge, which seemed to shut off the world beyond.

Whenever the man's gaze went back to his book, his expression was one of contentment. Whenever this gaze shifted toward the spires, an ironical smile twisted up the corners of his lips. He frowned, for they were after him down there. Nearly all the local advertising had fallen away, the stockholders were exhibiting signs of restiveness; and that signified that Mansfield or his agents had approached them.

His thought went to his mother. What a thoroughbred she was, to stick to him on his crazy adventure to follow his fortunes, when she might have remained in the peace and seclusion of the villa up Fiesole way with that riot of roses in the spring time and the sun on the red roofs of Florence! Cathewe, her maiden name; and to be forced to prefix it with Mrs. in order to share his fortunes!

There came an interruption—the whine of an automobile. A plague of them; a man had to climb the Matterhorn these days to find solitude.

"Sandy!" cried a woman's voice from the far side of the bowlder. "Sandy, come here! . . . Sandy!"

The automobile whizzed by. Cathewe recovered his book and stood up resentfully. But this resentment died swiftly.

On the slope just beyond the ditch where he had been flung, lay an Airedale, motionless. Kneeling beside him was Betty Mansfield, her hands clenched against her bosom, her eyes full of unshed tears.

"My dog! My friend and comrade!"

Cathewe dropped his book, ran across, looked at the dog for a moment or two, then picked him up tenderly and carried him back to the sunny side of the bowlder, where there was a patch of warm clover. The girl followed, dumbly. Not a word was spoken until Cathewe put his hand over the dog's heart.

"Is—is he dead?" she whispered.

"No." His hands roved hither and yon over the dog's body. "We'll wait a minute. I can't find any breaks. Probably stunned."

"My poor Sandy!"

A moment later Cathewe received a slight but pleasurable shock. He had reached for the dog's head the same instant as she, and their hands touched. A great bitterness swept over him for the aftermath of that pleasurable shock was the knowledge that he still cared.

A shudder ran over the Airedale; and presently the stump of his tail began to beat the turf, feebly.

"Sandy!"—joyously.

"He's all right," said Cathewe, confidently. "Simply knocked out. He's in luck. It's mighty hard to keep a dog these days; and yet I can't honestly blame the motorists. The animals will run at the cars. This is a particularly fine breed. Never saw anything like him around these parts. Big and strong enough to tackle bear." He began to pat the broad head. And the wag of the tail became more energetic.

Something in the wind. Wait for the next installment.

Time to Demonstrate Claim to Efficiency

A sarcastic old Irishman, the president of a small but well-known industrial company, was anxious to show production figures and he sent word for a brand-new efficiency expert who had succeeded in talking him into the ways of ultra modern business administration. The expert had succeeded in worming his way into a vice presidency as "vice president in charge of personnel." A messenger came from the expert:

"Mr. Jones says he is tied up and cannot get away."

The president drew a breath of satisfaction that the new executive had begun so industriously. He talked 20 minutes and again sent for the expert.

"Mr. Jones says he is tied up but is trying to get away."

The president didn't like this, but waited 15 minutes before trying again. The same answer came back, so he penned this note:

"Houdini gets out of a straightjacket and handcuffs under water in 40 seconds. I don't expect this from you but would appreciate your getting untied very soon or not claiming you're such a tremendously efficient guy!"

Not Appreciated

"My dear fellow," said John Clayton, "I wrote to a man who had sent me an abominable play, and said, 'My dear sir, I have read your play. Oh! my very dear sir! Yours truly, John Clayton.'"

"I told this story on many occasions with great success. At last I told it to one who did not laugh. He was my secretary. It seemed to me hard, indeed, that one's own secretary should not laugh at one's funny stories. It appeared to me that he had mistaken his vocation, and I said in a tone of some irritation, 'You don't seem to think that funny.'" Said he, "No, I don't. It was to me Mr. Clayton wrote that letter!"—From "A Player Under Three Reigns," by Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson.

Lesson for December 26

REVIEW

REVIEW—Moses to Samuel.

GOLDEN TEXT—Surely His salvation is nigh them that fear Him, that glory may dwell in our land.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Favorite Stories of the Quarter.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Stories of Israel's Leaders.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Great Men and Women of the Quarter.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Great Teachings of the Quarter.

Three good methods may be used for this review.

I. Assign to the members of the class a week ahead the task of preparing a description of the outstanding events of each lesson. The length of such descriptions will depend upon the number of pupils in the class and time allowed for the lesson.

II. Assign to the pupils the outstanding personalities of the quarter the task of making an analysis of these characters, pointing out the strong and weak points thereof. The principal persons appearing in the quarter's lessons are Moses, Joshua, Caleb, Gideon, Ruth and Samuel. Two pupils may be assigned to report on the same character, the one on the strong points and the other on the weak points.

III. Ask the members of the class to bring a written report on each lesson, giving the principal fact and the leading lesson thereof. The following suggestions are offered:

October 3. Moses sought the help of Hobab in guiding Israel through the wilderness. Though Hobab was a shrewd child of the desert, the Lord God was a better guide than he. Like Moses, we should acknowledge the leadership of the Lord, even though it may mean confession of our own failure.

October 10. Through unbelief spies were sent to Canaan. The majority report was brought by the ten spies. Joshua and Caleb recognized the difficulties equally with the ten, but because they had faith in God, counseled taking possession of the land.

October 17. Because of an act of disobedience Moses was debarred from entering the promised land. Though he had to suffer this loss, the Lord gave him a place in the very front rank of His prophets.

October 24. Upon Moses' retirement and death, Joshua was appointed as a new leader of Israel. Though God's servants die, His work goes on because the Lord has always in readiness capable leaders.

October 31. Six awful woes are pointed out as coming upon those who indulge in wine. The only safe attitude toward the intoxicating cup is not to look at it, not to come into its way; total abstinence is enjoined upon all.

November 7. Jericho, the key to the land of Canaan, fell prostrate through faith in God. Spiritual victories are won upon principles and by means which are utterly foolish in themselves.

November 14. Because of Caleb's sterling character and his loyalty to God, he came into possession of the inheritance which God had chosen for him.

November 21. In Joshua's farewell address he brought to the attention of Israel God's providential dealing with them and appealed to them to renew their covenant with his God. The people entered into a formal covenant at Shechem. In order to clinch this obligation Joshua wrote down their agreement in a book, and as a further help set up a large stone as a witness.

November 28. Gideon's army was reduced to 300. All who were cowardly were permitted to withdraw. Others unfit were likewise permitted to withdraw. A small company trusting God can win the victory over a mighty host.

December 5. Ruth chose to be identified with the people of the Lord. Because of this choice she came into possession of the blessings of the true God and her name has become immortal.

December 12. Because God gave to Hannah a son in answer to her prayer, she gave him up to service in the house of God.

December 19. As Samuel in his old age was retiring from the place of judgeship in Israel, he challenged the people as to the integrity of his conduct among them. Everyone in public life should be ambitious to leave an untarnished record at the close of his career.

ATTRACTIVE CURTAINS FOR THE BEDROOM

Dainty and Attractive Bedroom Curtains.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Here are bedroom curtains that combine daintiness and attractive color with the essential utility features. Sometimes in the desire to gain an artistic effect the usefulness of curtains is overlooked. All points can be combined in attractive, durable curtains, say the specialists of the bureau of home economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. Like everything else, it's all in the knowing how.

Admit Light and Air.

The curtains in this picture, for instance, let in plenty of light and air. The section shirred on rods and attached to the lower sash gives privacy when needed and goes up with the sash when it is raised at night. The straight gathered valance and the straight side draperies are easy to make and hang, and the fabric is a good quality washable marquisette. Even though soot and dust settle, their traces can be quickly washed out and the curtains put up looking as fresh as new.

Notice that the side draperies come to the bottom of the "apron," or board that finishes the window casing at the bottom. Also the valance is about one-sixth as long as the draperies.

Harmonize With Furnishings.

These curtains are also in harmony with the other furnishings of the room. Their lines reflect those of the simple painted bookshelves topped with a pair of plain brass candlesticks. The candles are soft yellow to match the dots in the curtain fabric, and in other accessories of the room.

GETTING RID OF RATS AND MICE

Modern Housekeeper Tries Plan of Extermination.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The modern housekeeper, of course, no longer climbs shrieking on the nearest chair if she happens to see a mouse running across the floor; much less does she indulge in a fainting spell. Instead, three questions are likely to pop into her head almost simultaneously: "Now, how did that creature get in here?" "What have I left around to attract a mouse?" and "How shall I get rid of him and all his tribe?"

She begins by hunting for any possible openings in the walls, around baseboards, near water or heating pipes, or in closets. She also casts her eye about for traces of careless housekeeping—either her own or that of a maid—crumbs scattered, food left uncovered, or in paper packages, starch or waxed paper exposed where mice can gnaw it, or any other tidbits likely to appeal to their wide range of tastes. She may be horrified to find mice tracks on the pantry shelves, in the drawers where she keeps her tea-towels, upstairs in closets, in rugs stored in the attic, although she has up to this time never even suspected there was a mouse in the entire house.

Exposing Poisoned Bait in Paper Bags Labeled "Poison" Along Natural Runways of the Rat or Mouse.

Rats, of course, leave similar indications of their presence in gnawed clothing, paper, food supplies. They are to be feared not only because of the damage they do, and the rapidity with which their numbers increase, but because they often carry and convey diseases, kill poultry, and other animals, and sometimes bite viciously when cornered or attack babies or children while sleeping. Similar methods of control are used against both rats and mice. The elimination of either pest from a whole community is the end to be desired, but this can only be accomplished by the organized effort of all citizens. When people realize that rats alone cause over $200,000,000 worth of damage a year, and that this is totally unnecessary waste, they are more willing to take measures to get rid of this expensive pest.

The individual housekeeper can at least make a beginning by closing up all openings through which rats and mice are likely to get into the house. Use a mixture of cement, sand, and broken glass or crockery in such holes, if you find any, or cover them with a sheet of metal. If your house has open studding in the walls from cellar to attic, they will be used for runways and passages to their nests by these pests. The studding should be closed. Buildings are frequently made entirely rat-proof now, when first constructed by the use of deep cement foundations, but older buildings must be protected as far as possible by closing holes and runways.

If the traps do not eliminate the pests, try poisoning with barium carbonate, if poison can be used with safety, where it will not be touched by children, poultry, or pets. This substance is an inexpensive white powder, both odorless and tasteless, and baits containing it are readily taken. The best way to spread poison is to mix it with a variety of foods and try placing different ones about on successive nights. Mix some with such foods as hamburg steak, sausage, fish, liver, bacon or cheese. Spread some on slices of vegetables and fruits, such as tomatoes, cucumbers, muskmelons, apples; or mix it with canned corn or squash, or pumpkin seeds, mashed banana, boiled carrot, or baked sweet potato. Mix another lot with rolled oats, bread, cornmeal, flour or cake, and with various table scraps. Add water to the barium carbonate when necessary to make the bait soft, or sprinkle the powder over the sliced baits, rubbing it into them with a knife. Use about one part poison to four parts food.

One way to expose the bait is to put about a teaspoonful of each of several kinds into different paper bags, twist the tops and drop them in places frequented by rats or mice. Another way is to put the bait on small pieces of cardboard. Do not use stale or spoiled food as bait. Uneaten baits should be picked up the next day and destroyed. Do not use baits over again if not taken. Continue to distribute baits until the rats and mice seem to have disappeared. The baits are usually carried into burrows or behind protecting boxes or furniture and eaten comfortably. The effect of the poison is gradual, and the rats generally have time to return to their burrows before they succumb.

Farmers' Bulletin 1302 gives other suggestions for rat control and for community co-operation in achieving it. The United States Department of Agriculture will be glad to send you a copy.

Left-Over Hominy Grits

Left-over hominy grits may be cut into slices and browned in butter or other fat to make a most appetizing dish good to serve at any meal. The slices should be at least a half inch thick, dipped in flour, and fried a delicate brown on both sides. Have the fat hot enough to form a brown crust quickly on the grits before the inside soaks up the fat. Also time the cooking so that the fried grits can be served as soon as they are browned.

SPENCERVILLE LOSES TO AUBURN

Auburn Varsity Drops Central Catholic

Auburn, Dec. 13—The Spencerville high school basket varsity basket ball team lost to the Auburn Reserves at Auburn Friday night by the score of 27 to 19. Auburn presented a fast, smoothing team with a defense and an offense that was more than Spencerville could stop. The Spencerville boys were unable to make their shots from the free throw line. They also failed to sink their shots from the field. Bowser was high point man for the visitors with nine points to his credit.

In the second game of the evening the Auburn varsity team come back from its crushing defeat at the hands of Angola Friday night and defeated the Central Catholic high school team of Fort Wayne 22-14. When the game started it looked as if the Catholics would win. Diek's sensational goal from back of center followed by another long shot looked good but Auburn stepped in and took command of the game and were on the long end of a score at the half. The Catholics come back strong the second half and held Auburn to five points, at the same time making ten, themselves. The thirteen point lead Auburn gained the first half together with a very loose job of refereeing was more than the down-staters could overcome. Three central men were put out of the game the second half, Diek and Logan for personal fouls and Arnold for unnecessary roughness.

Line ups and summary of the Auburn-Spencerville game:

Auburn (27)		Spencerville (19)
Riche	F	Furnish
Meyers	F	Musser
Hathaway	C	Hollabaugh
Bruce	G	Bowser
Roth	G	Laux

Field Goals: Bowser, 3; Hollabaugh, 2; Bruce, 3; Roth, 4; Hathaway; Furnish; Rastenburg; Davidson.

Free Throws: Roth; Hathaway; Meyers; Sprott, 2; Furnish, 2; Bowser, 3; Hollabaugh; Musser.

Substitutions: Mann for Laux; Laux for Musser; Markle for Furnish; Davidson for Bruce; Soerenson for Roth; See for Hathaway; Sprott for Meyers; Rastenburg for Riche; Smith for Sprott.

Referee: Leninger, Angola.

Dry Cleaning Protects the Health of the Nation

"DRY CLEANING" means the washing of fabrics in gasoline, naptha or benzol exactly in the same way as linens, etc., are washed in water in a laundry. Water is "wet" and when a thing is "wet" we mean it is filled with moisture. The volatile fluids used in "Dry Cleaning are FREE FROM MOISTURE, therefore the term "Dry Cleaning."

ECONOMY CO. J. N. GEORGE Owner & Manager

A Question of Health Clothing as well as drapes, carpets, etc. become disease carriers when left extended periods of time without cleansing. When "Dry Cleaned" in the properly equipped plant, a garment is immersed in volatile fluid, thoroughly agitated for 20 to 30 minutes, subjected to heavy centrifugal extraction and dried in hot tumbler or dry room, then pressed under heavy pressure with hot steam injected to sterilize and set the fabrics. Someone has said "The Germ that Survives That Process Deserves to Live!" Scientific investigation proves that Dry Cleaning does destroy the germs of disease.

A Question Looks Cothes do not always "Make the Man," but ofttimes their appearance do "Proclaim the Character" and we all wish to appear neat and clean.

A Question of Family Children's clothing is subject to much harder and less careful usage than that of adults—therefore the question of Health and Looks applies with double force to their needs. Habits of cleanliness and neatness formed in early life remain through age. Parents, what think you?

The Health of the Nation is the Wealth of the Nation

CHARGED WITH STEALING FROM SPENCERVILLE OFFICE

Francis Bardelot of Gar Creek, Ind., was arraigned in the DeKalb circuit court Tuesday on a charge of petit larceny

The affidavit was signed by Roscoe Walter, a Spencerville coal dealer. He says that a coal wagon driver brought $10 in cash into his office Monday and laid it down. Bardelot was in the office at the time and Walter later discovered that the money had disappeared.

Barbelot pleaded not guilty and was remanded to jail under $1,000 bond.

"Christmas-Tide"

Composed By Philip F. Smith
St. Joe, Indiana

There are no stories one-half so grand
As the one we know of the Holy Land;
And we love to tell it o'er again,—
Of the Christ, who died for the sins of men.
In Bethlehem, across the sea,—
Far from the shores of Galilee,—
In a little stable our Lord was born;
That was long ago, on Christmas morn.

On that famous night,—in the hours of sleep,—
Some shepherds were watching their flocks of sheep;
When, suddenly, in the silent night,
There appeared in the air a Brilliant Light;
'Twas an Angel of God; and He said unto them:
"Go, ye men, into Bethlehem;
Follow the guidance of that Star,
And ye'll come to where Mary and the Christ-child are!"

Now, as soon as the people the news did hear,
They came to the village from far and near;
And they brought great gifts,—so the story's told,—
Some of silver and some of gold.
And they all knelt down, and began to pray,
And worship the Babe who before them lay;
And God was pleased; and the Angels smiled
When they saw the love for the Holy Child.

Now, we'll skip a bit,—the years have flown,—
And Christ from a child to a man has grown;
With His Disciples,—twelve of them,—
He has gone to the City of Jerusalem.
'Tis the time of the great Passover Feast;
The City is crowded with man and beast;
And a noise comes up from the happy throng,—
A laugh, a shout, or a burst of song.

The Disciples, that evening, were filled with gloom
As they sat, with their Lord, in a private room;
For the time was near, as they all well knew,
When Christ with His Mission on earth was through.
But Jesus bade them to be of cheer;
"For though," He said, "the time is near
When I must die for the sins of men,
I promise ye I shall come again."

Later that night, in Gethsemane,
The Disciples were gathered beneath a tree;
And Christ went, alone, and prayed for all,—
For strength for the blow so soon to fall.
Then out from the City, in the night,
The Soldiers came, in a blaze of light;
And Judas led,—to assure no miss,—
And betrayed his Lord with a traitor's kiss.

We know how Jesus was led away
And then to Pilate, at break of day;
We know how he was so rudely tried,
And delivered up to be crucified!
How Jesus upon the cross was nailed
Between two thieves,—how the light then failed,
A storm burst forth, and the earth did rock
As the place was stricken by an earth-quake shock.

Then Joseph took the Lord's body down
To a new-built tomb, at the edge of town;
And before the door he rolled a stone,
That the body of Christ should be left alone.
And God sent Angels to watch and care
For the Blessed Son who was buried there,
The Christ who died for the sins of man
Who must lay three days, then rise again.

Three days later, at break of day,
Three weeping women made their way
From the town below to the Savior's tomb,
And peered within, in the silent gloom.
And an Angel, sitting there, rose and said:
"Why seek ye the living amongst the dead?
Go tell the Disciples, as I tell ye,
Christ rose, and went into Galilee."

That was long ago, and the years have fled
Since the day our Lord rose from the dead,
Since Jesus died for the sins of men,
Was crucified, buried and rose again.
But, though He's gone to His home above,
We're all blessed yet by our Savior's love.
Let's join our praises, from far and wide,
And worship our Lord this Christmas-tide.

DEATH OF MRS. C. L. WOODCOX BY TUBERCULOSIS

End Comes After A Long Illness

The death of Mrs. Emma Woodcox, wife of Cadmir L Woodcox, took place Monday afternoon of last week at 3:46 o'clock at Sacred Heart hospital

Mrs. Woodcox had been suffering for nine months from tuberculosis of the nose and lip. She became a patient at the Lutheran hospital in Fort Wayne August 17. Failing to improve, she was brought home October 20. Three weeks before her death she was removed to the Garrett hospital.

Mrs. Woodcox reached the age of forty-three years last May 11. She was born at St. Joe, her maiden name being Emma White. She and Mr. Woodcox were married August 15, 1908, and she had since that time resided in Garrett. Her parents, Frank and Ella White, are dead. Surviving besides the husband are two children, Richard, who will be fifteen in January, and Margaret Ellen, 11; and one brother, Delos H. White of Auburn.

Mrs. Woodcox was a member of the International Bible Students and of the ladies' auxiliary to the B. of R. T.

The funeral was held Wednesday morning at the home, the Rev. Tappett of Fort Wayne, officiating. Interment was made in the St. Joe cemetery. Among those in attendance at the services were D. H. White and family and Mrs. H. C. Hathaway of Auburn; C. A. Woodcox and family, Abe Culbertson and family, George Culbertson and Thomas White of St. Joe; Mrs. C. H. Bishop of Cleveland; Mrs. Austin Eicholts of Warsaw and Mrs. N. P. Baker and Mrs. Guy Strong and two daughters of Fort Wayne.

The St. Joe Choral Society filled an engagement at the Auburn Lutheran church, Sunday evening, and every member did himself justice. The program was miscellaneous and it pleased the congregation. After the service, the members were invited to the basement where coffee and doughnuts were served by the Auburn choir.

The following is taken from the Auburn Evening Star:

The musical at the St. Mark's Lutheran Church Sunday night was well attended and much appreciated. The Choral Society of St. Joe, consisting of 20 voices, under the able direction of C. A. Woodcox, thrilled the audience with everyone of their well chosen numbers. They came over to sing, not merely to entertain the people, but to have a part in the evening service and their selections consisting of anthms and solos produced a devotional and spiritual atmosphere.

Miss Phyllis Kosht is home from Fort Wayne Business College to spend her vacation. She spent over night Tuesday in the E. R. Kinsey home.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Shilling, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Curie, Mesdames R. W. Brodbeck, Carrie Harman and Chas. Hellinger, were at Fort Wayne Tuesday on a shopping trip.

On her complaint that her husband is a fugitive from justice on a charge of committing a felony involving immoral conduct, Pearl E. Oberlin of Butler, was granted a divorce from Roy Charles Oberlin in the DeKalb circuit court Tuesday. Mrs. Oberlin said she and her husband were married November 18, 1922, and that he abandoned her last September 11. He is reported to be in Florida. Inasmuch as service of summons upon the defendant was secured only by publication, the plaintiff was prohibited from remarrying within two years.

SHEER AND COLORFUL LINGERIE; VELVET COATS FOR DAYTIME WEAR

HOW many women would appreciate a dainty piece or more of lingerie as a Christmas gift? All in favor, signify by raising their right hands. Contrary minded, say "No." Not a dissenting voice! The vote is unanimous for a Yuletide gift of lovely lingerie. Let's accept this as a last-minute suggestion as to "what to give" to our sisters and our cousins and our aunts. Such lovely sets as one finds nowadays, all beautifully boxed, lacking only the name and address of the recipient to be, and the personal card of the donor. Others of us prefer to hand-make our gift rather than buy, in either case lingerie never fails to happily solve the gift problem.

There is quite a rivalry between dainty voile and crepe de chine just now. Fashioned of either, the effect is sure to be lovely, if the sheer fabric be exquisitely fine and colorful. There are, however, certain style points upon which creators of fashionable lingerie agree. To be of latest mode "they say" both chemise and gowns should be featured with novel lace yokes and there should be a generous knife plaiting of the sheer material.

Many of the French garments are plaited all the way round, contriving, however, to preserve a slim silhouette. Some of the chemise and gowns show group plaitings, such as here pictured. Here is something else to remember: hemlines are now scalloped and either trimmed with ruffled lace edging or set footing. The model in the picture shows how pretty the effect.

And listen to this! Sleeves are in fashion again. At last we will be able to distinguish gowns from chemise. Any number of the newer gowns have graceful almost-to-the-elbow sleeves, made of lace to match the yoke.

Here is a word of advice: When buying material for lingerie you intend to make at home, be sure to ask for triple voile. Real triple voile of good quality will wear and wear.

To proclaim the vogue of velvet for the evening wrap would be but to repeat that which has been heralded from the season's very start. But velvet for the daytime coat—that's a different story, which promises no end of fascinating chapters as the season progresses into midwinter.

As to the short velvet jacket, it has been and still is enjoying a popular vogue, but it is only recently that interest has turned in the direction of the full-length velvet coat for daytime occasion.

A perfectly charming velvet coat is this in the picture. Just to look at it makes one feel an urge to have one like it. It is very simply yet effectively styled of almond green velvet, strikingly collared, cuffed and bordered with gray wolf. The body of this smart straightline coat is finely worked in standing tucks grouped in rows of four extending from shoulder to hemline. The belt is of gray suede leather.

Perhaps this model would better suit your purpose if it be made of beige or gray velveteen, than which there is no more fashionable cloaking. A gild-ea leather belt with the beige or a silvered one with the gray would be just the thing. Of course the fur must be harmonized to the color of the velvet, for that is the mode's way of doing things this season.

Black and even colorful velvet coats for daytime wear are running close competition with those of cloth or fur. The details which feature smart cloth coat modes are the same for the velvet coat.

Clever women who know how to make a handsome appearance at a comparatively small outlay are investing in the black velvet ensemble costume, planning to use the long coat as a separate dressy wrap. There may be many a blouse to this suit, but the one for formal occasion must be of silver or gold cloth, or of some choice fabric all over embroidered with metal thread and paillettes. As to the coat, in order that it may measure up to the requirements of a winter wrap, it should be full length and handsomely furred.

Porter's Pain King
A Liniment
Quickly Checks Coughs and Colds. Used Since 1871

How many years has the "Pain King Man" been calling at your home?

More than 50 years ago, in 1871, Dr. Porter originated the idea of leaving medicine on a year's trial. Hundreds of thousands of bottles of Porter's Pain King are distributed every year on this fair plan by The Geo. H. Rundle Co., Piqua, Ohio.

There is such a steady, all-the-year-'round demand for Porter's Pain King, the original liniment, and Porter's Pain King Salve, that dealers everywhere now carry these standard home remedies in stock, and you need never be without them.

Many users have written letters telling how good Porter's Pain King is, how many things they use it for, and often adding, "I would not be without it." Read the directions wrapped around the bottle.

Her Idea

The Man With Three Names

BY HAROLD MacGRATH

(©, by Bell Syndicate.)
WNU Service

STORY FROM THE START

Brandon Cathewe, a young writer, returning from Europe to America, falls in love with Betty, daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield, steel magnate of the town of Bannister. Cathewe asks permission to court Betty, to whom he has not been introduced and has never spoken to, and Mansfield, in a spirit of sardonic humor, tells the young man he must first become a "force" in Bannister, and that until he has done so he must avoid Betty. The youth accepts the conditions.

CHAPTER II

Lord of Polygon Hill.

Across the shining threads of steel—the railway yard—a man ran lightly, with the sure foot of the athlete. He wore a blue checkered mackinaw and a woolen cap pulled down over his ears. Behind lay a sinister outline: giant furnace doors opening and closing, blinding rivulets of molten metal. Men, with the aspect of demons, flitted past these luminous backgrounds.

Beyond the runner stood rows of forlorn tenements, evidently his objective. He was in a hurry. At any moment a mile-long freight might cut him off. When at length he leaped across the last rail he was fairly well spent.

At the curb—to be precise, the ditch—in front of one of the tenements, before which ran a crumbling tar walk, stood a two-seated runabout, rusty and battered, but as faithful as a mongrel dog.

In the city of Bannister this ramshackle vehicle was as familiar to the sight as the police-van and the fire engines. You were quite as likely to see it reposing impudently before some handsome mansion on Polygon hill as here in Poverty row where, in truth, it seemed more at home.

The man in the mackinaw pushed his way into the hall of the tenement, climbed four gloomy flights of stairs and entered a forlorn room. In a window a newspaper served as a pane of glass. The surviving panes were dim with cobwebs.

At the side of a dilapidated iron bed sat a man in a fur-lined overcoat. He was Dr. Maddox, hale and hearty at sixty, white of hair and ruddy of countenance.

On the bed, under a tattered sheet, there was a body, sinisterly rigid in outline.

"Dead?" asked the man in the mackinaw.

"Yes, son. He was dead when I got back from telephoning you."

"I came as fast as I could. How did it happen?"

"He was old and slow, and got in the way of a swinging crane. There wasn't a whole bone in his body."

"Could he talk?"

"He mumbled something about the seventh plank from the west wall, naming you. What's your interest in him? He wasn't a Bannister man."

"Human."

The young man walked over to the west wall, counted off six planks in the floor, and pried back the seventh.

From the cavity he extracted a bundle of papers. "Doctor, do you know what doubled Mansfield's fortune after the war began?"

"What?"

"Those barb-wire machines. The dead man on the bed there was the inventor. These papers are the documents in the case. Is there nothing sinister in the fact that he lies there dead? Why should he be doing manual labor at three dollars a day, working at a kind of charity job, when he should have had all the comforts of life? Think of him, dying in bitterness like that! Eighteen dollars a week, with the music of his own creation in his ears, day after day, and another man taking all the profits!"

"You mean he was cheated and robbed?"

"Legally, no; morally, yes!"

"Brandon, have you anything personally against Dunleigh Mansfield?" asked the doctor.

"I hadn't when I came here to take charge of the Herald," answered Cathewe, as we know the man in the mackinaw. "I came to Bannister upon an almost unbelievable adventure. Some day I may tell you about that. No; at the start I had nothing against Mansfield. But for three years I've done nothing but stumble over cases like this; mean and contemptible, cold-blooded, but always within the law. What's the object in piling up more gold? He can't count his millions. He doesn't need money, and yet he robs a man like this!"

"What are you going to do—print this story?" asked the doctor, indicating the poor, broken thing on the bed.

"Yes! I've known all along what kind of a man Mansfield was. But I dared not attack him until I'd made the paper go. Now I can start the guns. Before I'm through I promise to render Mansfield impotent for future harm. I have facts, facts! My audience has learned to trust me; and they'll believe the Herald. I am going to protect these poor human beings who don't know how to fight for their rights."

"He will break you. What can you do against his tremendous power, which reaches from here to Washington?"

"I can speak the truth and back it up with incontrovertible facts."

"Mansfield has a daughter who believes him to be a demigod—as mine believes me to be."

"Ah, but you are one! Nancy Maddox has a right to believe that. But Mansfield's daughter! What is she but an inconsequent butterfly?"

"She is young. In judging her you may be a little hasty. Nancy, who is visiting her in Washington, says she is lovely and lovable."

"I was wondering what had become of Nancy. Miss Mansfield will improve. She can't help it, and be with Nancy Maddox."

The doctor's eyes sparkled. If only this odd, clean boy and his Nancy might fall in love with each other!

"Doctor, what would you say if I told you I was a man with three names?" asked Cathewe as they left the house.

"What? Three names?"

"Yes. My own and two others."

"What's the joke, son?"

For a block Cathewe remained silent. "After all, a doctor is like a priest—the repository of secrets. One more don't hurt you. I am going to talk to you as to the family physician."

"If is nothing I ought not to know?"

"I am not a fugitive from justice."

"I beg your pardon, son!"

"But I'm a kind of Ishmael. I am pursued by the Furies. I am in the same category as a ship beset by a typhoon—a victim. Three names. I have an assumed one. By that name I make a modest living, honorably. Brandon Cathewe are my given names, the tail of the kite, which is Hallowell. Have you ever by chance heard of Digby Hallowell?"

The doctor repeated the name ruminatingly. "Seems I've heard the name somewhere, but it escapes me at this moment."

Of What Was He Afraid.

"You will recall it with a little digging," said the young man. "And when you do, remember I'm Digby Hallowell's son and my mother is his widow. Here we are. Thanks for the lift. When you pick the Herald off your doorstep tomorrow morning, you'll see some interesting facts relative to Dunleigh Mansfield, 'the Lord of Polygon Hill.' I'll call him! That will make a good catch phrase!"

* * * * * * *

When Dunleigh Mansfield greeted his daughter and Nancy Maddox in his Washington home his face was expressive of pleasure and amiability. "I shall have to leave you two after dinner," he said. "I am expecting to wind up a contract. You are not afraid to ride about alone?"

"The dark," said Nancy, "has no terrors for either of us. It all depends upon what you read."

"And what do you read?" asked Mansfield, who was really a fine scholar.

"Good books, books about human beings who are striving to better themselves. I like that 'Prosaic Lives.' The author wrote from his heart."

Mansfield picked up the book from the table. "A green young man. It is quite patent that he wrote from his heart, not from a brain that had gathered the facts first-hand and sifted false ideals from the true. A good book, a worth-while book, must be the result of a nicely balanced brain and heart. If you let the heart dictate, you generally invite trouble. It is as if a soldier were giving orders to his general. A well-written book, but green."

"But what an odd name to assume!" Betty balanced the book on her palm. "George Cottar; Kipling's Brush Boy. And there you are," declared her father. "A dreamer, not a doer; a dweller in a fairyland of his own making, observing life through roseate clouds!"

"But what would we do in this world if there weren't any Brushwood Boys?" asked Nancy. "Don't we all make believe at one time or another? Do you mean to tell me that you've never built any dreams?"

"Oh, when I was a youngster, probably—the kind of dreams you mean. I have my dreams all right; but they come to me in the form of blue-prints. And I have the advantage over your George Cottar, for my dreams come true."

"Didn't his?" said Betty, softly.

"But that's a story only. It happened in a book," and Mansfield started for the hall.

* * * * * * *

People in Bannister, on the morrow, when they picked up the Bannister Herald off the front steps, sensed a shock, at once pleasurable and sorrowful. By noon the whole city was aware of the fact that Mansfield had been boldly and skillfully assailed in his castle-keep.

Between the counsel for the Mansfield interests in Bannister and Mansfield himself there were exchanged a series of brief telegrams. An excerpt of the story had been telegraphed to Washington.

From Washington: "Is it black mail? Give the editor a scare."

From Bannister: "No blackmail. He won't scare. Have seen his proofs. We can't do anything through courts."

From Washington: "Buy the sheet."

From Bannister: "Editor says it is not for sale."

From Washington: "What is editor's name?"

When Mansfield received the answer to this query, he was in his study.

Impatiently he ripped open the yellow envelope and drew out—Medusa's head! Anyhow, he stared at the sheet motionless and stonily, in a kind of petrified astonishment. He had all but forgotten the man and the incident.

"Brandon Cathewe!"

CHAPTER III

Mansfield Plans Reprisal.

That fellow, that impertinent beggar Cathewe, had taken a joke in earnest! Gone to Bannister and bought a newspaper! But why was he turning his cannon upon him?

Dunleigh Mansfield wondered. If he wanted Betty, why attack the father in this manner? The infernal blackguard!

Of course he had purchased the invention outright, at an absurd figure. That was merely good business. A perfectly legal business deal; the moral side of it was negligible.

Spite, probably! Young Cathewe had suddenly realized that Betty was as far out of his reach as the stars, and had now embarked upon a campaign of spite.

The young anarchist must be suppressed before he made any headway. Mansfield must find out how long the fool had been in Bannister and what success he was making of the sheet. Actually gone to Bannister to become a "force!"

Betty, however, must know nothing; the scurrilous sheet must not fall into her hands. It was perfectly legitimate business; but the young woman had odd ideas in her head.

Soon she would be returning to Bannister. He did not want her to go back there at all, but there was apparently no visible method by which he could dissuade her.

Why didn't he want her to go back? That puzzled him. Of what was he afraid? That in returning to Bannister she might eventually learn that her father was not quite the demigod she pictured him?

Well, he would have Cathewe out of the way before she did return. His only concern was that she might stumble upon something in type.

Very few in Bannister would dare whisper even that Dunleigh Mansfield was not always scrupulous.

There existed, though, a human being who could embark upon such an enterprise as that he had named as a condition to wooing Betty, who could accept conditions which would have wrinkled the brow of the young Hercules.

> You've learned his second name. When is he going to use the third?

Woman's Rights Well Established in Tibet

Marriage in Tibet is not the least interesting of the customs of that remarkable country, writes an exploring globe-trotter in a British paper, reported by the Atlanta Constitution. As a rule it takes place only in families possessed of wealth and social position. According to the laws of Tibet, the eldest brother has the first right to marry, since he alone inherits the ancestral property. But if there are brothers the bride is shared by them as by so many junior husbands. On the day of the wedding the bride is barricaded in her home. Long arguments, in which the whole village takes a part, over the profitableness of the marriage are indulged in through a hole in the door. Finally a scarf is waved, as a sign of surrender and the gates are opened. The bridegroom's mother then hands out sour milk and cakes to the guests and the ceremonies begin. The Tibetan woman is very much the head of the household. The men must bring their earnings to her. When they need money they must ask for it. A husband who is idle too long is liable to be reprimanded or even divorced and driven away.

SAMUEL THE JUST JUDGE

LESSON TEXT—I Sam. 7:1-17, 12:1-25.

GOLDEN TEXT—Prepare your heart unto the Lord and serve Him only.

PRIMARY TOPIC—God Helps the People at Mispah.

JUNIOR TOPIC—The Victory at Mispah.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What Samuel Did for His People.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—How the Lord Helps.

I. Samuel Called the People to Forsake Their Idols (7:1-6).

Under the administration of Eli, the nation rapidly deteriorated. For their sins, God permitted the nation to be bitterly oppressed by the Philistines. Samuel promised them deliverance on the condition of repentance.

II. Samuel Prayed for the People (7:7-14).

Moved by fear of the Philistines the people besought Samuel to cry unto God for them. In response to his prayer God miraculously delivered them from the Philistines.

III. Samuel Judging Israel (7:15-17).

Bethel, Gilgal, Mispah and Ramah were his circuit, to each of which he made annual visits. These centers were for the accommodation of the people.

IV. Samuel's Farewell Address (12:1-25).

When Saul, the new king, was crowned, Samuel turned over to him his authority, and gracefully retired.

1. Samuel's challenge to the people (vv. 1-5).

(1) A reminder of the way the king had been given (v. 1).

He showed that they were directly responsible for the change in government. Though keenly feeling the reflection upon himself, and their ingratitude to God in their demand for a king, he had not resisted their wish.

(2) Review of his own administration (vv. 2, 3).

a. Walk from childhood (v. 2). Samuel's was a remarkable life; from childhood to old age he had lived an upright and pure life.

b. Career as judge and ruler (v. 3). He boldly challenged them to show where and how he had ever oppressed anyone.

(3) The vote of confidence by the people (vv. 4, 5).

It was Samuel's right as he laid down the reins of government to have his record vindicated and to have his integrity established beyond a doubt, so that no evil-minded man should ever be able to cast reproach upon him.

2. Samuel reviews God's dealing from the time of Moses (vv. 6-15).

He reasoned with them concerning the good hand of the Lord upon them from the time of Moses. Though they with ingratitude turned from the Lord and demanded a king like the other nations, He had acceded to their request and set a king over them.

(1) National prosperity conditioned by obedience (v. 14).

Though they had displeased God in choosing a king, if they would fear the Lord and render obedience, national prosperity would still be given.

(2) Disobedience to God meant the nation's ruin (v. 15).

It is folly to ask God's blessing upon a nation while it is living in rebellion against Him.

3. Samuel's own vindication (vv. 16-19).

This was such a critical hour in the history of the nation that Samuel sought to indelibly impress its meaning on their hearts. This he did by means of the thunder and rain out of season. Harvest time was not the season for thunder and rain, so when it came at the call of Samuel, the people were affrighted. They saw it as an example of God's mighty power, which if directed against them, would destroy them in an instant.

4. Samuel's gracious response (vv. 20-25).

(1) "Fear not—serve the Lord with all your heart" (vv. 20-22).

Samuel did not minimize their sin but assured them that if they would serve the Lord wholeheartedly He would not forsake them. The ground of their hope was the faithfulness of God in keeping His covenant.

(2) "God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you" (v. 23).

The people had rejected Samuel, yet he had such magnanimity of soul that he did not allow their ingratitude to cause his intercession for them to cease. He assured them that in spite of their sin their one concern should be to fear the Lord and serve Him wholeheartedly.

Pleasure

The pastor says: To expect adequate refreshment for the human spirit from mere pleasure is like gathering dewdrops and blowing upon them to keep them moist.—John Andrew Holmes.

Repentance

Repentance is a hearty sorrow for our past misdeeds, and a sincere resolution and endeavor, to the utmost of our power to conform our actions to the law of God.

The KITCHEN CABINET

(©, 1926, Western Newspaper Union.)

Now blessings light on him that first invented this same sleep! It covers a man all over, thoughts and all, like a cloak; it is meat for the hungry, drink for the thirsty, heat for the cold, and cold for the hot. It is current coin that purchases all the pleasures of the world cheap, and the balance that sets the king and the shepherd, the fool and the wise man even.—Cervantes.

FOOD FOR WINTER DAYS

During the chilly early winter days it is wise to have a stock pot on hand, so that hot soups may be a daily food. A most delicious meal, if the evening meal is light, is begun with some sort of hot soup, cream of stock or vegetables.

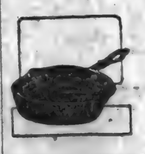
Chicken Warmein.—This is a good cold weather dish. Stew a nice fat fowl in plenty of water to make broth. When the fowl is cooked remove it and cut all the meat from the bones. In the broth cook two or three bunches of celery cut into small pieces; when cooked remove the celery and add noodles, cook them until done, and with all the other things kept hot, serve a nest of cooked noodles on the dinner plate, cover chicken and celery with gravy and serve with mashed potatoes. Save enough of tender hearts of celery and some of the white meat of the chicken for chicken salad. The broth that is left may be served by adding cream and egg, making a most nourishing soup for the night meal, a day or two later.

Cranberry Ice.—Cook a quart of cranberries in a pint of water six minutes. Strain through a cheesecloth, add a pint of sugar and stir until dissolved. When cool add the juice of two lemons and freeze to a mush. This will serve a dozen.

Chicken and Green Pepper Sandwiches.—Parboil for ten minutes green pepper with seeds and fiber removed. Chop fine and mix with one cupful of cooked seasoned chicken, moisten with mayonnaise. Spread thinly sliced rye bread with butter, using lettuce and the filling.

Sandwiches.

For a cold night and a supper dish there are a variety of hot sandwiches to appeal to the appetite.



Hot Egg Sandwiches.—Slice a small onion very thin and fry in a little butter; when well cooked add an egg, when cooked to taste place on buttered bread with the onion, cover with another buttered slice and serve at once, seasoning well.

Cheese and Herring Sandwiches.—Work one cream cheese and two teaspoonfuls of beef extract to a blended mixture. Skin and bone and finely mince fillets of herring, or those put up in mustard may be used; there should be an equal measure of cheese and fish. Moisten with mayonnaise, spread slices of bread with the cheese mixture and press the fish into slices of buttered bread; put slices together in pairs.

Gingerbread Sandwiches.—Cut gingerbread into three-inch squares, split and spread with cottage cheese that has been moistened with cream and well seasoned. On the other squares place chopped preserved ginger or orange marmalade. Put together in pairs and serve with hot tea or cider.

Hungry Hunter Sandwiches.—Have ready a round steak cut one-fourth-inch in thickness, cut into pieces a trifle smaller than the slice of bread. Pound the steak with the edge of a heavy saucer until the fiber is broken and the meat barely hangs together. Drop into a well-greased hissing-hot spider and turn quickly when seared. Cook until well browned, spread with butter, sprinkle with salt and pepper and minced parsley. Place on buttered bread, cover with another slice and serve at once. Serve with horseradish if preferred.

Lobster Salad Sandwiches.—Remove the meat from a freshly cooked lobster, or if not at hand, a canned one. Finely chop and add an equal quantity of chopped celery and one-fourth the quantity of hard-cooked eggs. Moisten with mayonnaise. Spread thinly sliced and buttered bread. Cut the sandwiches into narrow strips. Serve with tea at bridge parties.

Cottage cheese well seasoned and mixed with green pepper and chives finely minced makes a delicious filling for sandwiches.

King George a Preacher

While the ex-kaiser, who is unable to find a publisher for his sermons, is a mere layman, our own king—though very few people may be aware of the fact—holds a clerical appointment entitling him to preach. His majesty is a prebendary of St. David's cathedral, receives one pound per annum in respect of that office, and is entitled thereby to preach in the cathedral—but only once a year.—London Tit-Bits.

Tube Under the Tyne

Europe, too, is going in for river tunnels. It is now proposed to construct a tube under the River Tyne, which, it is said, would be used by from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 passengers a year. Engineers urge that a tunnel of this sort would be much more practicable than a bridge.

A QUICKER WAY TO END COLDS!

To quickly break up a cough or cold, it is necessary to do two things: 1—Get rid of phlegm. 2—Heal irritation in lining of throat, chest and bronchial tubes.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral accomplishes this by its powerful double action. It cuts away phlegm because its medication penetrates through and through the linings of throat, chest and bronchial tubes. You feel almost instant relief, all the way down. Then it is absorbed into the irritated membranes, just as ink soaks into a blotter. As its soothing, healing properties are absorbed by the membranes themselves, it stops the cough, breaks up the cold and brings prompt, lasting relief.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is hospital-proved. Prescribed by physicians. Pleasant to taste. 60c and, twice the quantity, $1.00, at all druggists.

The Road to Happiness

by Katherine Edelman

ARTHUR BENTON had been born with the proverbial silver spoon in his mouth. Ever since he could remember he had never felt the need of a single thing that money could buy—there was scarcely a wish of his that had ever been left ungratified. His father had left him a large fortune before he was twenty-one and things had always been very easy for him. His father, shrewd business man that he was, had left the money so that there would be no chance of Arthur's running through it in a hurry, were he so inclined. But he need not have worried on that score, for so far it seemed as if Arthur was truly following in his father's footsteps—his one desire seemed to be to add to the pile. He did not even spend one-fourth of the lavish allowance he had been left which would come to him each year until he was twenty-eight.

He was now twenty-five and there seemed great danger of his developing into a money-making type. Not that he denied himself a single thing that he cared for, but like many others who have had everything all their lives, Arthur never stopped to think that there were many whom he could help to happiness by a little of what was his.

Three days before Christmas he stood at the counter of one of the largest stores in town. It was during the rush hours of the day and the clerks were all busy. Arthur chafed at the delay. "Hang it all," he thought to himself losing the thread of the story or poem in watching the play of her delicate features or the glint in her shining hair. But he liked best of all when she sat and talked to him and told him of herself and her ambitions. She and her father were very much interested in little crippled children and they were planning to build a home where they could be cared for. Her father was a doctor and the most wonderful man in the whole world. He had done so much for the poor of the city, but she rather feared that this time he was trying to do more than was possible—he was finding the financial aid for the home a great problem. As she spoke he could almost visualize the multitude of little ones that would come to the home through the years and pass out of its doors again into the world strong in body again. What a wonderful work it would be—how great a privilege to have even a part in its making!

Finally there came a day when there seemed no further need of Arthur Benton staying at the hospital. The doctor had pronounced him as fit as a man could be and he, himself, felt that it was true, yes, even more than true. For in addition to regaining the health and strength that had been his before, something new and wonderful had come into his life—something that made him feel better and happier than he had ever felt before. For he had won the love of a girl so wonderful that he marveled each time he thought about it. Helen Goodman was different from all the girls he had ever known—there was no question about it in Arthur's mind. He had also learned the many wonderful things that he could do with his wealth—how much happiness he could bring to humanity by using part of it to do the things for which there was such a crying need—and how much happiness he could also bring to himself in doing all of this.

A few weeks later there was a wedding and the two who had been brought together during the Christmas time started out as one, on a road that was straight and shining—the road to happiness.

The Children's Patron Saint

by LILLIAN F. LEWIS
in Herald and Presbyter

KRISS KRINGLE, St. Nicholas, or Santa Claus—
Small matter which name we select—
Bestows all his thought on the Yuletide, because
So many his call then expect!

He travels by night and he travels by day,
Not minding our snows in the least,
So eager is he to advance on his way
With tokens to brighten the feast.

No burden to him seems the play of his parts,
Though heavy the load that he bears;
But, bulging with goodness, how tender his hearts,
And merry the smile that he wears.

He's never disposed to be sullen or sad,
The reason is simple and plain;
By caring for others and making them glad,
A reaping of joy is his gain.

No wonder all love him and welcome his cheer,
This kindly, benevolent guest,
Who promptly appears, ere the close of the year,
With holiday greetings the best.

The song of the angels, the Star of the Sky,
Lend Christmas a halo indeed;
To no little child would the master deny
The boon of its blessing and heed.

IN BETHLEHEM

By Mary E. Kiefer,
In The Epworth Era

I.

If I had been in Bethlehem town
That night, so long ago,
To see the golden sun go down,
And stars begin to glow,
The star I'd mostly want to see
Was one that led to Mary's knee.

II.

If I had been in Bethlehem's cave
Among the cattle there,
To look for one who came to save,
And heard his mother's prayer,
The one I'd mostly want to see
Was Christ, who was a child like me.

CHRISTMAS TREES

By MARJORIE BARROWS
In Child Life

LITTLE pines upon the hill,
Sleeping in the moonlight still.

Are you dreaming now of me
Who bloomed into a Christmas tree?

Baby moons of gold and red
Cuddle close beside my head;

In my tangle leaves a string
Of fairy stars are glimmering;

While my arms, for girls and boys,
Blossom with a hundred toys.

O, little pines, it's fun to live
To be a Christmas tree—and give!

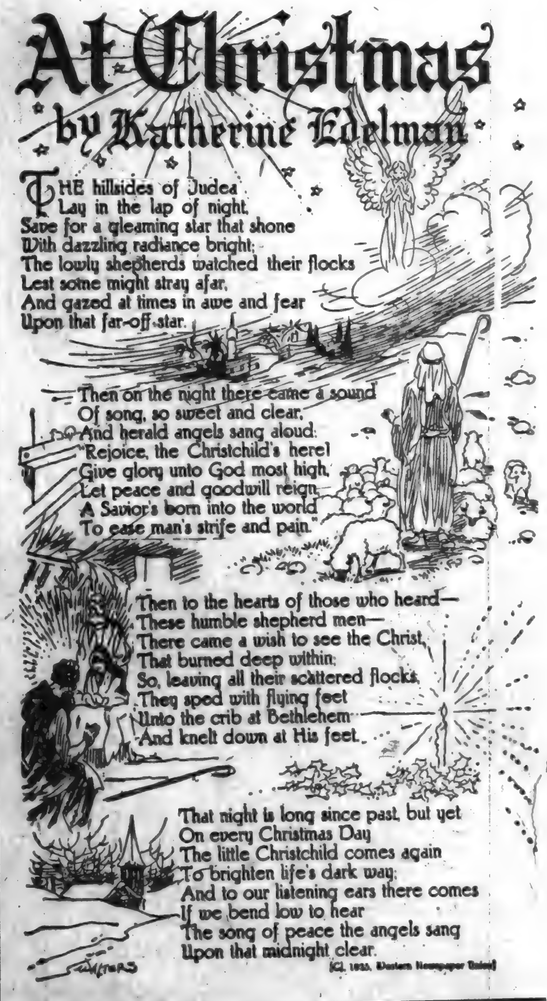
At Christmas

by Katherine Edelman



THE hillsides of Judea
Lay in the lap of night,
Save for a gleaming star that shone
With dazzling radiance bright;
The lowly shepherds watched their flocks
Lest some might stray afar,
And gazed at times in awe and fear
Upon that far-off star.

Then on the night there came a sound
Of song, so sweet and clear,
And herald angels sang aloud:
"Rejoice, the Christchild's here!
Give glory unto God most high,
Let peace and goodwill reign,
A Savior's born into the world
To ease man's strife and pain."

Then to the hearts of those who heard—
These humble shepherd men—
There came a wish to see the Christ,
That burned deep within;
So, leaving all their scattered flocks,
They sped with flying feet
Unto the crib at Bethlehem
And knelt down at His feet.

That night is long since past, but yet
On every Christmas Day
The little Christchild comes again
To brighten life's dark way;
And to our listening ears there comes
If we bend low to hear
The song of peace the angels sang
Upon that midnight clear.

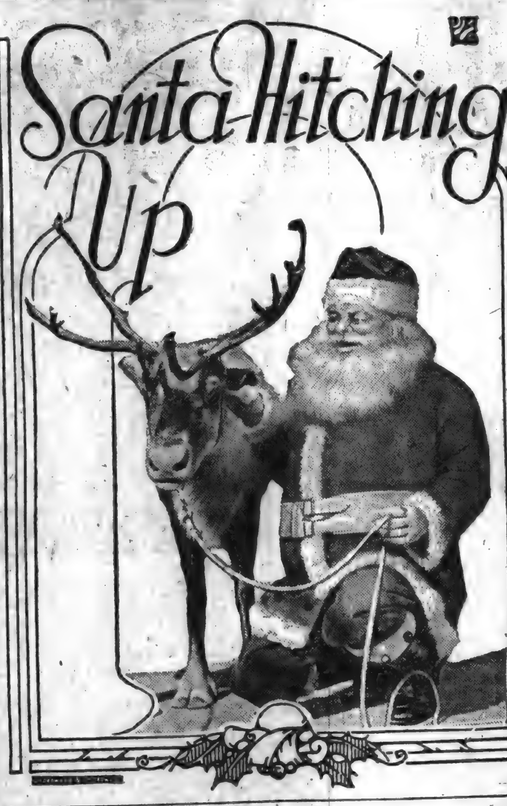
Santa Hitching Up



Santa Claus' Sugar Plums

By Mary Graham Bonner

IT HAD always been such a nice, deceptive way in which to speak of specially delicious and delectable sweets—sugar plums.

Her grandmother had called candies and candied fruits and luscious bonbons "sugar plums." And she had always, because she liked candied fruits so particularly, called them "sugar plums."

It had been seventeen years since Rose had first remembered hearing of "sugar plums." She had been three then, and her grandmother had said in the wise, wise way that grandmother always had of knowing what was what, "Yes, only Santa Claus knows how to get the choicest of sugar plums."

Rose Had Been Very Busy Getting Ready for Christmas.

Rose was very busy getting ready for Christmas. It was a busy time in the family. There were mince pies to be made and plum puddings, and almonds to salt, and fudge to make, and wreaths to make, and bells to fix, and fresh candles to put in the candle-sticks—red candles at this time of the year.

It was a time for general cheer, and from Rose's family a great share of this cheer went forth.

It was not that they were wealthy. They were, in fact, the opposite.

But it was their great satisfaction that by hard work and great energy of spirit they could do a great deal in a small way for every one with whom they came in contact at this season of the year.

Every present, no matter how simple, was prettily wrapped. There was no condescension in their giving. To them it was a big part of their Christmas delight that they knew so many people with whom they could share their Christmas sacrifices and the result of the late hours they kept for weeks before Christmas in their innumerable small preparations. Saving was always such fun throughout the early autumn. Of what fun was saving if it were all to be forever hidden?

There were two presents awaiting Christmas morning for Rose to unwrap. They were for her and she had taken them in when they had arrived, but she had not opened them.

She was curious about these presents. She knew they would be quite simple, but one was from Billy and one was from Joe, and both Billy and Joe had lately been running a race, as it were, for Rose's acceptance of engagements, for her favors.

She liked Billy much better than she did Joe. She knew that Billy liked her. She knew that Joe liked her, too. She felt that Joe would always make her very comfortable, would always be very kind, very dutiful, and that she would always have to be dutiful, too.

Of course, that was all right. But she felt that with Billy she would want to make him so very happy, and with Joe, that it would be so much more of a duty.

Yet Joe was more reliable, he was less irresponsible, less spontaneous, and so much more exact. But Billy was such a dear!

She could label all Joe's good points. Billy's were less tangible, but they were there, all right, even if she couldn't name them.

She helped her mother with the last Christmas Eve touches, covered the fire over with ashes, put out the lights and finally went to bed.

The next morning she opened Joe's present first. Somehow she wanted to keep Billy's to the last, the way she had done with things when she was a child.

There was a little note with Joe's present, telling her what she knew he had been wanting to tell her for a long time—how much he thought of her, what a good wife he knew she would be—of that, he said, he was confident. And he hoped she would be of the same opinion about him. He would make her, he was quite sure, a good husband.

Then there was a word about the present. He had not known what to give her this year; he knew she had all of those things which, as their positions now were, were the only things he could give her, but his mother had suggested a very complete sewing-box.

There was no note with Billy's present. Just a card upon which he had written:

"I think you like these 'sugar plum' things. Merry Christmas." It was a wholly unreasonably large box of candied fruit.

Later Billy himself came around. What a dear he was! Oh, yes, Billy

"Crazy Present I Gave You," Billy Was Saying.

was a dear. And they had mistletoe, too, and Billy was grabbing her and was saying:

"Crazy present I gave you, but I know you like sugar plums; and, anyway, I had in mind a diamond ring, but just thought I'd speak to you about it first."

Billy had his own ideas. "Sugar plums." Joe had consulted his mother and there had been a sewing box. Oh, she couldn't tell just why, perhaps, but she did love Billy and she didn't love Joe. Perhaps it was because Billy was just a dear.

"The 'sugar plums' win," she said, and I'd love the diamond ring."

Billy didn't quite understand the first part of her sentence, but he did the last—and, after all, that was all that was necessary!

If Back Hurts Begin on Salts

Flush Your Kidneys Occasionally by Drinking Quarts of Good Water

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Too much rich food creates acids which clog the kidney pores so that they sluggishly filter or strain only part of the waste and poisons from the blood. Then you get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, constipation, dizziness, sleeplessness, bladder disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage, or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin to drink soft water in quantities; also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any reliable pharmacy and take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help flush clogged kidneys and stimulate them to activity, also to help neutralize the acids in the system so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder disorders.

Jad Salts is inexpensive and cannot injure; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink, which everyone can take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and the blood pure, thereby often preventing serious kidney complications.

Experts in the employment of the government have demonstrated that a very fair quality of paper can be manufactured from the common cornstalk.

Nurse's Advice Rid Her of Pimples

Brooklyn, Mrs. Minnie Fensterer writes:—"My pimples and blackheads got so bad I feared it was eczema. I confided in a nurse friend of mine. I had been troubled with constipation and indigestion for some time. She advised me to try Carter's Little Liver Pills. You can see by my picture that the treatment has done wonders, and I am now free from constipation."

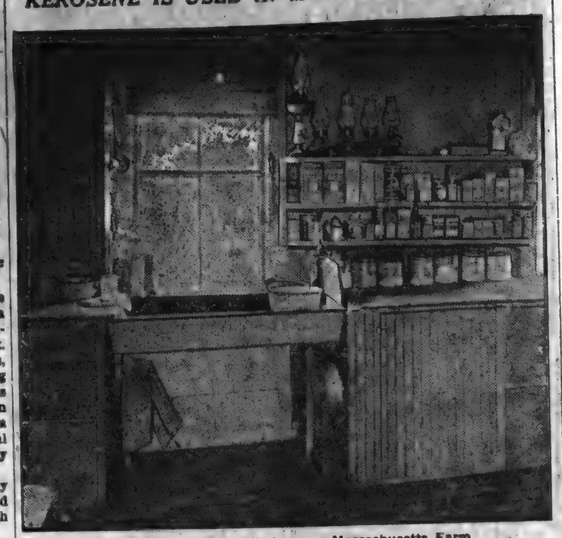
KEROSENE IS USED IN MANY RURAL HOMES



Well-Arranged Kitchen on Massachusetts Farm.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In many rural homes kerosene lamps are still a necessity. One of the inescapable daily duties of the homemaker is to see that the lamps are filled, clean, and ready for use, one at least for each room in the house. It is a good plan to have a few extra lamps on hand in case the work of filling those in use has for any reason been postponed.

The actual handling of the kerosene is best done out of doors or in some outside building that will not be marred by the chance spilling of oil, nor affected by its odor. The large kerosene can, funnel, clean rags, and scissors for trimming wicks, as well as pliers for handling them easily, should be kept together in this place in a tray or box. Owing to the danger of fire from oily rags, it is best to discard those which have been used or keep them in tightly closed metal containers.

Care of Lamps.

The reservoir of each lamp should be filled to within an inch of the top and wiped clean. The charred portion of the wick should be rubbed off, the char removed from the wick tube and the burner, and the wick turned down just below the top of the tube. Uneven wicks should be trimmed a little. The chimney should be cleaned either by rubbing with tissue paper or by washing in hot soapy water, rinsing in clear hot water, and wiping perfectly dry; if there is any moisture on the chimney when the lamp is lit, it will crack. This work is probably best done at the kitchen sink. As it is advisable to bring the lamps into the house when they are filled, so as to avoid going out of doors when one is needed, a shelf near the sink is a good place to keep them until wanted.

Well-Arranged Kitchen.

The illustration, taken by the United States Department of Agriculture, shows a well-arranged farm kitchen in Hampshire county, Massachusetts, which has a shelf for the lamps over the work counter and near the sink. Here the clean chimneys are replaced and the lamps and shades dusted. As basin, soap and towels are also close at hand for greasy hands after the lamps have been attended to, this arrangement saves many steps for the one who has the care of the lamps. It is well to reserve a special towel for use after handling lamps and to wash the hands again before preparing food. Nobody likes the flavor of kerosene.

MASHED POTATO PUFFS ARE GOOD

World of Difference in the Way of Preparing Them.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

The most noticeable difference in the food in one home as compared with that of another in similar circumstances is not what goes on the table, but what has been done to it—how it has been prepared, seasoned, cooked, and served. In a given locality almost everybody has the same general foods, but there is a world of difference in the way these are presented to those who eat them.

Take mashed potatoes, for example. Probably there are few common foods served more frequently. In one home they taste absolutely uninteresting. Perhaps they are watery, or lumpy, or not salt enough, or unattractive in color. Another housewife knows how to make mashed potatoes smoothly fluffy and light, creamy with butter and milk as well as perfectly seasoned with salt and pepper, and how to pile the result temptingly in a serving dish, sprinkled with paprika, or topped by a jaunty bit of parsley. She hasn't worked any harder than the first housewife, and although the butter and milk she has used may increase the cost of the dish by a cent or two, the added nutriment thus received by the family is worth the difference, and may make it possible to serve less of something else. The unconscious pleasure in a meal given by an attractive, appetizing dish is one of the factors in good digestion, we are told, and certainly the family eats better and more willingly if the appearance of everything is pleasing.

After preparing mashed potatoes properly, you can make all sorts of variations on the way they look when they come to the table. The cook who must serve white potatoes a great many times in the course of a year may easily appear to be serving something different if she is ingenious. Here is one of these appetizing variations, suggested by the United States Department of Agriculture:

Mashed Potato Puffs.

Begin by making a sufficient amount of mashed potatoes. Allow one and a half or two potatoes for each person, or the amount you generally require. Pare them thinly and cook whole in boiling salted water. Drain them as soon as they can be pierced to the center, or they will absorb too much water and become soggy. The potato water contains part of the nourishment we get from potatoes, particularly the easily dissolved minerals, so do not throw it away. Use it as the basis of a soup, or in gravy making. If you make your own bread, you will make the potato water valuable for that.

Put the potatoes through a ricer—not too many at a time—or if you haven't a ricer, mash them thoroughly, getting out all the lumps. Meantime put the milk, butter and seasonings over the fire to warm. Use two or three tablespoonfuls of milk for each cup of riced potatoes, and one tablespoonful of butter. Do not get the mashed potato too moist. Make a well in the bowl of potato, and add the milk gradually, beating thoroughly until the whole mass is light and fluffy. You now have mashed potatoes as nearly perfect as you could wish them. They are ready to serve as they are, or to beat in a baking dish to be browned, or to make into potato cakes or souffle, or to mix with other foods such as hash for a shepherd's pie. The uses are innumerable.

To make potato puff, allow an egg for each three cupfuls of mashed potato, and beat it up without separating. Fold this lightly into the hot mashed potato, and if you like the puffs very fluffy add a pinch—one-quarter teaspoonful—of baking powder. This is not necessary, however. Drop the mixture by large spoonfuls on a greased baking pan and bake. Start with a moderate oven so that the puffs will rise a little, and then increase the heat. The puffs should be delicately brown on top when done. Brushing them with a little cream or melted butter will help to color them nicely.

Spanish Cream Enjoyed by All Young Children

Spanish cream is one of the most delicious desserts one can make. It is also delicate and easily digested and especially suitable to give to children. As it is necessarily made early in the day to give the gelatin time to set, this dessert is one that the housekeeper will welcome. Many flavors may be used in a Spanish cream, such as chocolate, caramel, butterscotch, almond, orange, vanilla or different fruit flavors.

To make a quart of Spanish cream use one ounce of gelatin to one quart of milk. Put the gelatin to soak in half a cupful of cold water. Add half a cupful of sugar and a fourth of a teaspoonful of salt to the milk and put on to heat in a double boiler. Beat five egg yolks and gradually add the hot milk to them. Mix well, pour back into the double boiler and cook this mixture until it thickens like a soft custard. Then add the softened gelatin to this hot mixture, stir well, strain and cool. Meanwhile beat the five egg whites until light and fluffy. Fold them into the custard after it has begun to set and add a teaspoonful of vanilla. Pour into individual molds or a pudding dish, wet with cold water, set away to become firm. Serve with cream or a fruit sirup.

POULTRY

FEEDING LAYING HEN IS REAL ART

Much of the success in winter egg production is obtained from a bucketful of feed in one hand and a bucketful of common sense in the other. Feeding the laying hen is a real art, for so much depends upon the poultryman's decision each day in the matter so that his birds will work most efficiently.

The feeder is a skilled mechanic who systematically holds the birds up to 50 to 60 per cent production from November 1 to the following fall, without causing a slump in egg production and at the same time maintaining their health and vigor.

One of the first prerequisites in feeding is to understand what the egg consists of. It is made up of a yolk, white, shell, and is two-thirds water.

The yolk is fat and is made from feeding fatty or starchy foods, as corn, wheat and oats.

The white is animal protein, which is made from material such as meat and milk.

The shell is made mostly of calcium, which is found in certain kinds of stone and oyster shell. In order to aid in the digestion of all of these foods some bulk is desirable which is green and succulent, such as sprouted oats, mangel beets, cabbage, etc.

In order for these foods to be properly digested, an abundance of grit should be available, as this acts as the hen's teeth in grinding the food in the gizzard.

Water is cheap. Have it before the birds at all times.

Legume Hay Helps Solve the Green Feed Problem

Legume hay helps solve the winter green feed problem for the chickens. Experiments in Ohio, Kansas, Texas, and California seem to indicate definitely that where no other source of green feed is available the addition of a legume hay will increase the number of eggs produced and their hatchability. It will also reduce the mortality from nutritional troubles, points out G. S. Vickers, extension specialist in poultry at the Ohio State university.

Save the hay with the most leaves and the greenest color for the chickens. An easy way to feed chickens hay is to provide a rack along the wall and keep hay before them all the time. A trough along the bottom of the rack will catch all the leaves that would otherwise be wasted. These can be fed from the mash hopper.

Alfalfa meal may be used if good hay cannot be bought at reasonable prices. The meal should be used in the mash. About 10 per cent alfalfa meal will substitute for a like amount of bran. A combination of mangel beets and legume hay makes a good winter combination to use instead of sprouted oats. It may be that hay is about to take the place of our old reliable, but troublesome, sprouted oats as a winter green feed.

Poultry Hints

The laying hen never loafs.

Soy beans can be used in a poultry ration if minerals are added.

Poultry raising brings quick returns and involves a small capital investment in land, buildings and equipment.

The factors of scientific poultry housing are to keep the pens, yards and houses clean, dry and sanitary.

Thanksgiving and Christmas seasons offer good markets for capons. January and February are also good months since at that time poultry of all kinds is scarce and buyers are willing to pay top prices.

Systematic culling may profitably be practiced throughout the year. Sick birds, those lacking in constitutional vigor, and those showing any sign of physical defects should be disposed of whenever found.

Litter that is not kept loose and light is too heavy for the hens. Put a little down first; when that is broken and fine, add more.

Ducks have been successfully bred up until seven years of age. The age of vigor and productiveness in a duck is double that of the hen.

Green food in some form is essential and should be provided regularly during the winter months. Cabbage, carrots, turnips, beets or potatoes will serve.

When culling a flock one should find out whether it is the hen or the owner who is at fault.

Everything inside a poultry house should be made removable so that it can be cleaned.

Summer chicks command good prices in late fall. They should weigh about five pounds to the pair. Those hatched in the fall stop growing as the cold weather sets in, and are usually small but compact in appearance.

Doll Now Antique

Some sixty-five years ago a little girl, just past five, woke one Christmas morning to find a doll, exquisite in its laces and ruffles of the style of the day, tucked under her pillow. Her Christmas was complete. Today that same doll reposes on a shelf of an antique shop at Hillsboro, N. H. It was brought there by the same little girl, now quite grown up.—Boston Globe.

Birds Travel at Night

Birds which make long distant migrations travel for the most part by night, for several reasons, and one of these is that they are free from natural enemies then. On the other hand they encounter many man-made dangers, one of which is the bright lights from automobiles and lights houses that first attract and then blind them so that they fly into objects and because of their speed are killed by the impact.

What makes life dreary is the want of motive.

Home Bureau Activities

The Concord Township Home Bureau enjoyed an all day meeting Friday, December 17, at the home of Mrs. Nettie Culbertson, in St. Joe. The ladies took pot luck lunch and in addition the committee in charge served creamed chicken, mashed potatoes and hot coffee. The table fairly groaned with its burden of good things to eat, and at the noon hour all did justice to it, with the possible exception of Abe Culbertson and Orange Herrick, who felt so out of place among so many ladies, that their apetite failed them, and they found it impossible to eat more than five or six plates full. After dinner a contest was given with Mrs. Maud Jenkins taking the prize and Mrs. Orange Herrick the "booby" prize.

Silent Night was then sung by the committee followed by two songs by the Club. A reading, "Hang up the Christmas Stockings" was given by Mabel Baker and a short talk on "The Meaning of Christmas" by Mrs. Gertrude Borthwick. Names were then drawn for the Christmas exchange and many were the beautiful and useful gifts received by the ladies.

The house was nicely decorated with rope and bells, wreathes and silver leaves; a Christmas tree on a mound of snow decorated one corner and made the day seem like a real Christmas day. Response to roll call was "One way I have been benefited by being a member of the Club the past year." Thirty-five members responded to roll call.

Mrs. Asa Shuff, Mrs. Andress and Orange Herrick were guests. One new member Mrs. Dell Brown.

The newly elected officers who will have charge of the Concord Township Home Bureau for next year are:

President, Mrs. Will Hamilton.
Vice Pres., Mrs. O. K. Shull.
Secretary, Mrs. Lloyd Draggoo.
Treasurer, Mrs. Fred Hull.
Press Cor., Mrs. Borthwick.
Project Leaders, Mrs. Howard Krise and Mrs. Howard Borthwick.

The Club will take up second year nutrition work for next year's work. The secretary reports a paid up membership of 38, it is hoped that number may be increased to 50 by the first of the year. Any lady who is not now a member is invited to join and urged to pay the membership fee of fifty cents and help us in our effort to make better homes and a better community, and to enjoy with us our friendships and our fellowship.

With the Churches

The following church officers were elected at the Christian Church last Sunday.

Trustees, Clyde Mason and Marvin Poper.

Clerk, Sam Keesler.

Elders, Dr. Sheffer, Ed Storer, Howard Borthwick, Sam Keesler, Meade Baker.

Deacons, A. Haner, Clyde Mason, Harry Kees, Ruben Koch, Marvin Poper, Vernon Woodcox, Merritt Maxwell, Russell Reasoner.

Pianists, Lena Meek and Lena Maxwell.

Choristers, Ruben Koch and Mrs. Borthwick.

The Christmas programs in St. Joe will all be given on Friday evening. You will be welcome at any of the churches.

The Coburntown Christmas Cantata entitled, "All Aboard" will be rendered Sunday evening by the Young People's class. You are invited to attend.

VOL. XL — ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1926 — NUMBER 52

NEW PROPRIETOR FOR ST. JOE GARAGE

Don Keller, of Auburn, is moving his family here today (Thursday) preparing to take charge of the St. Joe Garage, with the expectation of opening Monday, January 3rd for business. C. C. Woodcox surrendered his lease on the Garage Monday of this week. Mr. Keller is well known here, having worked here for some time.

WHEN THE YEAR BEGINS

New Year's Day, says The Dearborn Independent, is probably the most movable feast known to history. The ancient Egyptians and Persians celebrated this festival at the autumnal equinox, our September 22; the Greeks at the winter solstice, or December 21; the Jews at the vernal equinox, March 22. The Romans placed the commencement of the year at the winter solstice, until in the sixth century B. C., Numa Pompiius added two new months to the calendar, calling the first Januarius, and decreeing that January 1 be adopted in place of the old festival. The old Jewish New Year continued to be observed in Christian countries during the Middle Ages. The Gregorian Calendar, promulgated in 1582, lred January 1 as the first day of the year and the change was accepted by Catholic countries. But it was not until 1752, when the British Parliament legalized January 1 as New Year's Day, that this date was accepted by the Protestant world. Gift-giving and the exchange of greetings are old New Year's customs. The Persians exchanged eggs; the Romans dried figs, dates and honeycombs; the ancient Britons, branches of the sacred mistletoe.

LONG AND SHORT

Contradictory fashion now provides for both long and short hair. Short hair or at least the appearance if short hair is given approval during daytime hours, while for evening the chignon is coming back to its own. Some meet this demand by letting the hair grow and wearing it in the day time arranged so as to look bobbed. Others meet the situation with a wig. These wigs do not always follow the color of the hair beneath. White wigs are popular abroad especially if they have either a certain pinkish or bluish tinge.

In Society

A very delightful Christmas was enjoyed by about thirty members and near relatives of the Wasson family when they met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Delbert Draggoo last Saturday. A bountiful pot luck dinner was greatly enjoyed by all after which a short program was rendered by the younger members present assisted by Ira Bone.

A beautiful Christmas tree occupied one corner of the room and held beautiful gifts for all. Those present besides the Draggoo family were: Mrs. Isa Sheerer and two children, Mr. and Mrs. Gene Webster, Mr. and Mrs. Sherman Rickett, Sam Daily and son, Keith, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Hull, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Hull, Mr. and Mrs. Ira Bone, Mr. and Mrs. Gerry Wassan, Miss Loretta Funk, Dorothy Keller and Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Wasson and family.

LICENSED TO WED

Ralph Ayers, 22, farmer, Waterloo, and Lillian Nagler, 20, Auburn.

Martin J. Miser, 26, mail carrier, and Frankie Wise, 20, clerk, both of Waterloo.

Earl Mortorff, 30, railroad fireman, Garrett, and Leone Widdifield, 25, stenographer, Auburn.

Charler A. Timmerman, 20, laborer, and Marjorie Furnish, 19, both of Spencerville. The groom's father, John H. Timmerman, consented to the marriage.

Claude J. Meyer, 52, railway postal clerk, and Ida Mae Johnson, 37, both of Waterloo. The first wife of the groom is dead and the bride was divorced from her first husband last Thursday. The license was issued Christmas day.

COUNTY MINISTERS MEET IN AUBURN

Will Oppose Any Move to Authorize Sale of Alcoholic Liquors in Drug Stores

The DeKalb County Ministerial Association held its monthly meeting Monday morning in the assembly room of theEckhart Public Library in Auburn. The Rev. G. F. Hubbartt, the president, presided and the Rev. C. F. Dame of Auburn had charge of the devotions. There was an attendance of seventeen.

A communication from Dr. E. S. Shumaker, superintendent of the Indiana Anti-Saloon League, was read by the secretary, the Rev. J. E. Poer of Corunna, in reference to an effort that will probably be made to legalize the sale of alcoholic liquors in drug stores for medicinal purposes at the coming session of the Indiana legislature. Also the dry forces hope to strengthen the law against the driving of motor cars by intoxicated persons. A motion prevailed that a committee be appointed to act for the association in case such action be needed. The chair appointed the Revs. I. C. Boyts of Auburn, C. M. Eberly of Waterloo and W. W. Elliott of Garrett. On motion of theRev. R. A. Soerenson the ministers edorsed the effort being made by the Federal Council of Churches to bring about a widespread reading of the Bible during the months of January and February.

The association considered itself more than fortunate to be privileged to have Dr. Louis N. Rocca, rector of the Trinity Episcopal church in Fort Wayne, to speak on the subject "Christian Art and Its Relation to Worship." For an hour and a half this expert spoke on his theme and answered questions, showing the live interest that is becoming evident in all the churches for more worshipful buildings. Some idea of the way the preachers were profited is shown by their passing unanimously the motion of the Rev. C. C. Cripe of Corrunna to invite Dr. Rocca to again address the DeKalb county preachers in the near future.—Star.

RECORD OF GAME WARDENS WORK

Wardens of the Indiana state conservation department arrested 144 persons during October, and of these 132 paid fines and costs amounting to $2,437.90, according to Richard Lieber of Indianapolis, department director. The leading offenses were hunting and fishing without license, 46; taking fur in closed season, 36; hunting on Sunday, 25; possession of unlawful seines and nets and using same, 18; hunting without landowner's consent and arrested at his request 6; killing quail in closed season, 4; pursuing waterfowl in motor boat, 3. The corresponding month in 1925 showed 175 arrests, 167 convictions and fines and costs totaling $3,559.75.

Is Squinting Merely A Habit

No, it generally has an error of vision as a cause. This error causes eye strain and the eye strain causes the squinting. To stop the squinting, start at the beginning—correct the error of vision. In most cases when that is done there is an end to the squint. We have corrected many cases of this kind. If interested call.

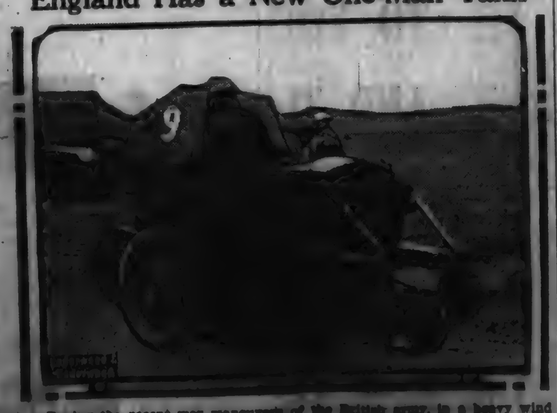
Looks Like Union Jack but Isn't

Visitors to the house of representatives often mistake this flag in the office of W. P. Jarrett, delegate from Hawaii, for the Union Jack, but it most emphatically is not. Delegate Jarrett explains that he is "flying" the Hawaiian flag, which was designed by a Britisher in Honolulu and therefore somewhat resembles the Union Jack.

England Has a New One-Man Tank



During the recent war maneuvers of the British army, in a heavy wind and rain storm, these new one-man tanks were exhibited and performed well. The tank runs on either wheels or caterpillar tread and carries a machine gun.

GRAIN KING

Herman Trelle, homestead farmer of Wembley, Peace River, Alberta, who was crowned both wheat and oats king of North America at the hay and grain show of the International Live Stock exposition. This is the first time in history the two championships have been won by a single exhibitor. Trelle is an American by birth. Ten years ago he homesteaded 160 acres in the Peace River district, and now he owns and farms 480 acres.

Lesson for January 2

THE CHRISTIAN A FOLLOWER OF JESUS

LESSON TEXT—Mark 1:16-20, 2:13-17; I John 2:6.

GOLDEN TEXT—And said unto him "Follow me," and he arose and followed Him.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Learning from Jesus.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Enlisting with Jesus.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What it Means to Follow Jesus.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Receiving Jesus as Saviour and Lord.

I. Jesus Calls Four Men to Follow Him.

1. Who they were (vv. 16, 19).

Simon and Andrew, John and James, two pairs of brothers. It is usually wise to engage in the Lord's service in fellowship—in pairs. This is not only necessary for effective testimony, but for needed fellowship on the part of workers and protection of the witnesses.

2. From what they were called (vv. 16, 20).

They were called from positions of definite service. God always chooses His servants from the ranks of the employed.

3. To what they were called (v. 17).

"To become fishers of men." These men no doubt had been successful as fishers. The qualities which made them good fishermen, namely, patience, bravery to face the storm at night and perseverance which led them to toil all night, though no fish were caught, would make them good fishers of men. Winning souls for Christ requires great patience, bravery and perseverance. Becoming fishers of men is the most important business in the world. It is the hardest work in the world to do.

4. The cost of obedience to Christ's call (vv. 18, 20).

Obedience to Christ's call meant sacrifice, painful separation, to give up all business interests and leave their father behind. Regardless of the cost they yielded prompt obedience. They put their trust in Him who called them, believing that He was able to supply all their needs.

5. Their reward (v. 17).

These four men have wielded wondrous influence in the world. Their names have become immortalized. Had they remained at their business they would only have been humble fishermen.

II. Matthew Becomes a Follower of Jesus (Mk. 2:13-17).

Matthew was a despised tax gatherer under the Roman government. For a Jew to fill such a position was to become unpopular. Since they regarded taxes paid to the Roman government as unlawful extortion, a member of their race engaging in the business of tax collection was to be exposed to shame and contempt.

1. Observe the abruptness of this call (v. 14).

While sitting at his place of business he heard the call of Jesus.

2. The definiteness of the call (v. 14).

It was to follow Jesus. To follow Jesus means to learn of Him and to engage in service for Him.

3. His instant decision (v. 14).

Matthew did not stop to reason on the question, but rendered definite and instant obedience. He openly gave up his business and identified himself with the Lord. Happy is the man who has the good judgment to instantly respond to the call of the Lord even though it may be costly. Matthew made a feast and invited many of his publican friends to meet his newly found Saviour. This had a twofold objective:

(1) An expression of grateful appreciation to the Lord for His saving grace.

(2) To bring his former friends and associates into touch with his newly found Saviour. It is natural for those who have found the Lord to desire to bring their friends into touch with Him.

III. Walking as Jesus Walked. The Supreme Test of Abiding in Him. (I John 2:6).

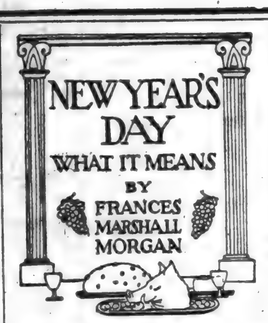
Abiding in Christ means to have experienced the life of God in Christ, to have come into contact with Christ's personality and to be consciously living in fellowship with Him. Christ's oneness with the Father and His devotion to His will is the supreme and grand example. Anyone who pretends to abide in Christ, who is not walking as He walked, is not entitled to the claim of Christian. The walk of the Christian implies the whole of his life. The reality of our profession is determined by the consistency of our walk.

"Ye Must Be Born Again"

Wesley, who, it is said, preached three hundred times from the words, "Ye must be born again," was asked, "Wesley, why do you preach so often on 'Ye must be born again'?" Because," said Wesley, "ye must be born again!"—King's Business.

Forgiving

And be ye kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.—Paul.



NEW YEAR'S resolutions continue to be the inspiration of the folk who write our "funny stuff," and the artists who do the newspaper comic strips, indeed would be at a loss without them, as they serve as a target for some of their best and most humorous work. We simple folk who "follow the funnies" would feel we had been cheated if the New Year's antics of our favorites did not include a few hundred broken resolutions. But with all the fun that habitually is poked at them, if for no reason other than the existence of these resolutions New Year's is a worthwhile institution. It is a great thing, the knowledge that whatever our mistakes in the past the New Year offers us a fresh beginning. Knowing this, we hold our heads a little higher and life is vested with a new thrill. We straighten our shoulders, so to speak, and go forward with brisker step. There is new encouragement in our hearts and renewed faith in our capabilities. The fact that the custom persists is proof that it is, in some measure, efficacious.

Of all our special days New Year's is one of the oldest and one of the most universally celebrated. Through some forty centuries the celebration has persisted and as far back as 1491 B. C. the Jewish New Year was changed so that the Passover succeeded it.

Rome, undoubtedly, observed the New Year from the beginning of that place, but a definite form was given the observance when Numa instituted a feast and dedicated it to Janus, god of the New Year. This was about 713 before Christ. A cake of new meal mixed with incense, salt and wine was offered the pagan deity and on this day craftsmen started some special work and the philosophers began recording their theories. And on this day the consuls assumed office.

It is said that the custom of making New Year's gifts originated with Tatius Marcellus, king of the Sabines.

"Happy New Year to You!" the Cheery Salutation.

One year that king received a present of branches cut in a wood dedicated to Strenia, the goddess of strength. The king was pleased and set his seal of approval upon the idea and forthwith established the custom of making gifts at New Year's and called these gifts, "strenae."

The bestowal of remembrances upon our loved ones and friends on New Year's Day is still a custom observed by many people and a very charming custom, at that. The giving of a potted plant, a favorite book, a graceful basket of fruit or other simple remembrance is a pretty compliment and one sure to please the recipient of the gift.

The old-time custom of making New Year's calls is not now as widely observed as was formerly the case. In some localities however, the New Year's call is still considered an important social obligation. It is a fine custom and one that deserves to be kept alive. It keeps one in touch with one's acquaintances, the ties of friendship are closer drawn and those among us who for one cause or another are inclined to drop out of the old circle, are again drawn within its blessed bonds.

There are many folk who do not follow the custom of bestowing gifts at New Year's nor is a formal call upon friends a pleasure that is convenient for everybody—yet for all of us there remains the cheery salutation of friend to friend on January 1.

What a world of good will is tucked away in these simple, time-honored words! They are the equivalent of saying, "I wish for you health and prosperity and commend you to God's care for twelve long months to come, dear friend!"

Yes, New Year's is a splendid observance from whatever angle we view it, and without doubt this world is a finer, better place because of some of its customs.

THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYES

By JEAN NEWTON

(©, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

What Would You Do?

"What would you do if you were the wife in the case? Would you stick by your husband if he had done as this one did?" That was the poser I found in the first letter I picked up in today's mail.

The "case" is that of a man with a wife and three children in a suburb and another establishment in the city where lived the other woman and their seven-year-old son. His dual existence, carried on for the last ten years, was discovered only through his arrest for embezzlement of funds belonging to the firm for whom he had worked for twenty-one years.

What would I do—would I stand by him? The wife to whom he had been married for twenty-four years was asked that same question. What she said was:

"I never dreamed of this. I don't know what I'll do; I've got to think it over."

She did say he had always been good to her and their children. The other woman who had lived with him under her precarious "Mrs." for ten years, said the same for him:

"I don't know anything about it. I loved him. He was always good to me."

After all, what these women do or what the real wife does, who is the only one who can help or harm him now, will depend more upon how he treated her during the years of their married life than upon the sudden discovery of his having led a double life. If the man had never made her happy, if his great deception, discovered now, was but a culmination of general untrustworthiness and unreliableness and disloyalty, then she will probably consider herself well rid of him and leave him to his fate.

If, however, as his wife of twenty-four years says for publication, he was always good to her and their children, he has doubtless earned an affection which will lead her, in spite of herself, to stand by him. When the terrible shock of her discovery has passed, her attitude will be one not of indignation at the man who has disgraced his family and broken up his home, but pity for one who has gotten terribly "in bad."

The embezzlement which brought about the denouement was the result of his attempt to maintain two homes in moderate comfort: and if, as both women say, he was always good to them, if his dual existence was the result of obligation incurred by him in a moment of foolishness and weakness, one cannot help pitying him, as we would any weakling overtaken by his punishment, even though that punishment involves, as it usually does, the innocent.

"What would you do if you were his wife?" is a bit of a poser. Who can tell what we would do in some one else's place? Do we ever know ourselves until the forcing hour of circumstance compels us to action? What most of us think, of course, is that such a thing would never happen to us. So doubtless thought his wife.

The Monuments We Build

A recent news item told of a mausoleum worth several hundred thousand dollars that a rich man was building as a monument to his memory.

And this brought to mind other monuments that have been left by those who have gone before us.

The most magnificent, from the viewpoint of costliness and ingenuity, are the pyramids of Egypt, the tombs built during the lifetime and under their own supervision by the mighty pharaohs, to guard their precious remains and stand to remind future generations of their mighty splendor.

Most noteworthy amongst them is the pyramid of Cheops, which cost over 20 years' labor of 100,000 men! To what can this be a monument, but to the colossal egotism and conceit of a man who might have used his enormous power to benefit his fellowmen and so have built a monument that was still more lasting and certainly more worthy.

I thought of another monument to himself, built by another man. Disinterested in fame, indifferent to whether he would be known to future generations, Abraham Lincoln built himself a monument by the saving of a nation and the freeing of a race. That monument, for the building of which no man's labor has to be enslaved, will remain indestructible and impregnable long after the greatest pyramid has crumbled into dust.

Any reminder of the powerful pharaohs is interesting as a curiosity. But every likeness that has been carved or molded or painted of the great emancipator, the world regards as a shrine.

The greatest monument to one's memory that any man or woman can build is service to one's fellows. And it need not be one that towers high and awes the multitude. It is a monument that the humblest of us can build, with the material of love and cheer and service, in the hearts of those about us every day.

The Man With Three Names

By Harold MacGrath

(©, by Bell Syndicate.) WNU Service

STORY FROM THE START

Brandon Cathewe, young writer, has bought a newspaper in Bannister as part of his plan in becoming a "force" in the town, which position he must attain if he is to court Betty, daughter of Dunleigh Mansfield, steel magnate of the town. Cathewe prints a story telling how Mansfield has defrauded a workman of a valuable invention, which has made Mansfield rich. Doctor Maddox learns that Cathewe is the son of Digby Hallowell. Nancy, the doctor's daughter, is Betty's chum, and together they read the article. Mansfield learns that Cathewe is the new editor. Betty tells Nancy she is intrigued by several love letters received from an anonymous writer, but which suddenly have been cut off. Later, Cathewe meets Betty on the outskirts of the town. Her dog, Sandy, has been hurt.

CHAPTER IV—Continued

The girl on her part began to observe. First, the hand, which was lean and brown and well kept. The sleeve of the shirt, however, was frayed at the cuff. The shirt also lacked the top button, and there was a sunburned patch at the base of the throat. Brown corduroys, such as Italian roadmenders wore; and the hems were tucked into dusty russet half-boots. (As a matter of fact, Cathewe kept these togs in the office, where he could don them whenever the lure of the highway called, which was every day when the weather was good.) The sight of his face, however, had the effect of a blow. Where had she seen this handsome, vigorous face before? Somewhere; she was positive of that. Fine, sensitive gray eyes and a mouth which would have been called beautiful in a woman. And above this mouth she saw the replica of her father's nose. Then, from the corner of her eye, she saw the book Jean Fabre, in the original! The face and hands of an artist, the clothes of a day-laborer, and a volume of Fabre on insects! She almost forgot the dog.

"Sandy is all right. Eh, old top?" Cathewe held out his hand.

The dog eyed the hand, quizzically, and approached. He permitted the strange hand to stroke his head, and his tail wagged a little.

"Well!" said Betty, getting up. "Sandy never permits strangers to touch him."

"But all dogs know me," said Cathewe, picking up his book. "Fine comrades, aren't they? I had a little dog a while gone. He was just plain dog. But that didn't matter. We understood each other at once."

Of all the unusual men! was her thought. What a beautiful head! Certainly she had seen it before. But where? She must find out who he was. No man so odd as this one could wander about Bannister without being known.

"Pardon, but have I ever met you before?" she asked suddenly.

"I dare say you have seen me from your car."

"Probably that is it. Fabre. You are reading him in the original?"

"Good mental exercise."

"I suppose the ant's life must be very interesting to you."

"Indeed, all life is interesting. Come along. I will show you an ant city, a Canton of the insect world."

Presently the philosopher came to a broad, flat stone. Very carefully he put his fingers under the edge and with a quick heave sent the stone over. The cavity was aswarm with ants. Battalions and regiments scurried about.

She gazed fascinatedly at the black atoms. They were taking hold of the eggs and drawing them rapidly into innumerable subways.

Ostensibly Betty was interested in the new ant city, but her eyes did not convey any memorable impressions to her brain; that was busy with conjecture. A gentleman of her own sort, because he was courteous and unembarrassed. Apparently he knew that she was Dunleigh Mansfield's daughter, and was not in the least awed by the fact. That rather pleased her.

He did not introduce himself, which was another good sign. It left her free to recognize him the next time they met or pass him by. She was quite confident that he was not a native of Bannister. An out-of-doors man and a scholar; the shabby clothes now fitted into the scheme of things. Men did not pursue their studies in natural history, dressed as for a tea party. Who and what was he?

Nancy Maddox would know, for Nancy knew everybody in Bannister. He would be very easy to describe. Doubtless she would be meeting him during the winter. She still retained the impression, however, that he had seen him before, and not in Bannister.

"Thank you," he heard Betty say. "It has been very interesting. I have read Maeterlinck on the bee, but Fabre is an undiscovered country. Come, Sandy; we must be going."

There was an impulse to offer her hand to this unusual young man, but she smothered it. She turned back toward the highway, the dog leaping and barking joyously.

"A lucky dog," said Cathewe, smiling. "He has defied the law of irresistible force and lives to tell of it. Good afternoon."

He crossed over to his boulder and once more reclined against the sun-warmed granite surface. He waited for a little time, then peered around. Her hat was just vanishing down the drop of the hill. He opened his book—upside down.

"The postern gate!" he murmured.

At half after five Nancy was agreeably surprised by the advent of Betty.

"Nancy, I've had the queerest adventure," began Betty at once, and rather breathlessly. "No; I don't want any tea. I came for some information. It was so droll and unusual."

And lightly, with those Gallic gestures which came so naturally, she recounted what had taken place on the top of the hill.

"Dressed like a tramp and reads Fabre in the original," mused Nancy. She was about to hazard a guess when the telephone in her father's office rang. "Just a moment, Betty. Telephone. It may be some patient of father's." Once at the instrument she recognized Cathewe's voice.

"Nancy, I've had rather an odd experience; and I'm going to depend upon you to help me out. I've met Mansfield's daughter. Please do not disclose my identity. You understand? I want to avoid her."

"Do you want me to lie, Brand?" Nancy answered.

"Lie? Lord, no! Only, I don't want her to know who I am. I'm sorry.

"It Has Been Very Interesting."

Don't lie on my account. Tell her if you must. Good-by."

Slowly Nancy set the receiver on the hook. She did not hasten back to her guest. Why was her heart heavy with foreboding? At last she returned to the living room.

"Dressed like a tramp," she repeated, "and reads Fabre in the original. It might be one of your father's chemists, Betty."

Nancy hated lies, and she hated herself for telling this one, when it was not obligatory in the least. She was a little afraid.

* * * * * * *

After his interview with Nancy Cathewe went in to his mother.

"Play something before the maid comes in to light up."

"What do you want me to play, sonny?" in a soft, Southern drawl.

"Rachmaninoff's Prelude."

"Then things aren't well with you?" How easy it had become to read the boy's mood by the kind of music he wanted!

She sat on the bench, but she did not begin the Prelude. Instead, she struck the opening bars of Farwell's Norwegian Song, plaintive rather than melancholy. She could dimly see him, his chin in his palm, staring at a pattern in the Chinese rug.

"Better?" she asked softly.

"I am always better when I am with you, mother. Life is an astonishing mess, isn't it? For the innocent as well as for the guilty. I, who have never wittingly harmed anyone or done a mean thing, I must always carry with me the sense of being hunted, the fear of being found out. And I have dragged you into it."

"Sonny, I'd be very happy with Nancy as my daughter," she changed the subject.

"The substance rather than the mirage. But I don't love her, mother. I know that. But is the other a mirage? Nancy says not. What a muddle! My new book—I'm afraid I'll have to chuck it. There are too many other things buzzing about in my head. Here comes Mignon. Dinner's ready."

* * * * * * *

In the great manor on Polygon hill, Betty sat curled upon the broad window seat, watching the receding gold and scarlet of the September sunset. That is, she seemed to be watching it. In reality, she was just recovering from a stunning, paralyzing mental blow. The door to the Apocalypse had opened slightly. On her knees lay a crumpled newspaper. She found it on the floor of the limousine, where some sardonic jester had tossed it.

"My father! They lie, they lie!"

Down below, in the study, a local banker eyed the end of his cigar through half-closed lids. Mansfield, his fingers pyramided, watched him expectantly.

"Do you want some unsolicited advice?" asked the banker, finally.

"Go ahead with it," said Mansfield, smiling tolerantly.

"Clean up these grogshops, which you really own. Tear down your rotten firetraps. Give the reform candidate the city hall to play with for two years."

Mansfield laughed.

"Dunleigh," continued the banker, "the people are thinking. They are finding the true cleavage between right and wrong. I warn you, they are going to do away with this political game as you and I know it. This fellow Cathewe is no ordinary disturber. I defy you to find a libel in his editorial comments. That boy goes down among men. He hasn't accused you of doing anything criminal, as understood by law. He attacks you from the moral side. Mark me, he'll soon be after your new munitions plant. The temporary hospital you have erected is too near the tanks. An explosion would knock it to flinders."

"Let the city fire department advise me about that," answered Mansfield, shrugging his shoulders.

"They are afraid of you, and you know it. If anything does happen out there—for lack of water—it will be criminal negligence; and this fellow Cathewe will hang your hide on his wall."

"Well, how much has he borrowed to keep his vituperous rag going?"

"Nothing."

"How has he kept going on, then?"

"I'll come to that in a moment. There are but seven stockholders in all. They have promised never to dispose of their interests to you."

"But I don't want the rag. All I need is to have him lose his following."

"And he isn't losing it. The paper's circulation is growing daily, despite the fact that you struck off his local advertising. Something really vital is going on. The poor are beginning to boycott the shops that have withdrawn their advertising at your command. Soon the advertisers will drift back, of necessity."

Mansfield frowned.

"Dunleigh, there's a mystery I can't get to the bottom of. There are four banks in Bannister. Being president of one of them and a stockholder in all of them, I am in a position to find out things. This young fellow Cathewe has an active account in each bank, and it is evident that he is paying the losses out of his pocket. Once a month he replenishes these withdrawals."

"Drafts on New York?"

"Cash. Nothing traceable."

"How much is his active account in each bank?"

"One hundred thousand dollars, cash!"

"Nearly half a million?" gasped Mansfield, with a full feeling in his throat.

"Yes," continued the banker. "Four hundred thousand will keep his paper going without advertisements for ten years. Another queer thing. I don't know about the other banks, but at mine he has two accounts, one general and one special. The general account is never more than two or three thousand. The special account is never drawn against except to pay the paper's pay-checks and expenses. Four hundred thousand, behind a newspaper like the Herald, has a tremendous power. My advice is to get your political and financial house in order."

Mansfield gets some advice from an important source in the next installment.

American Writer Who Turned to Buddhism

It is common for people of other lands to come to America and become citizens of the United States, but we seldom think of Americans taking out naturalization papers and so becoming citizens of some other country. Yet one famous American writer did just that.

This writer was Lafcadio Hearn, who was really an American, although he was born on a Grecian island of an Irish father and a Grecian mother. At the age of sixteen he ran away from London, and then came to this county, where he worked on a number of newspapers. Later he was sent to Japan to write articles for a magazine. He became so fond of that country that he spent the rest of his life there, adopted the Buddhist religion, became a Japanese citizen, dressed in the costume of the country and married a Japanese wife.

Hearn thus became almost completely an oriental, and better than any other occidental he has told us about the people of the Far East. Having himself become one of them, he was able to understand them more fully than any other westerner.

THINGS THAT ARE LIKED

If you are fond of liver from any young animal, especially calf's liver, the following will be liked:

Liver Patties.—Scald a pound of liver and then grind it through a meat chopper with one-fourth of a pound of bacon and one onion. Season to taste and form into small cakes. Cook in a little hot fat, turning until both sides are well browned.

Liver Hot Pot.—Cut liver into slices a half-inch thick, soak in cold water a few minutes, then parboil in the water until the water just boils up. Drain, dry and lay in a saucepan, dredge with flour, season and cover with slices of bacon and sprinkle with chopped onion and a tablespoonful of chopped parsley. Cook at the simmering point well covered for an hour and a half. Serve with rolls of fried bacon.

Liver Rolls.—Cut one-half pound of calf's liver into slices and parboil five minutes; wipe each piece dry, lay a thin slice of bacon on each slice of liver; season with salt, pepper and nutmeg and roll up and fasten with a toothpick. Dredge with flour and fry until tender in hot bacon fat. Thicken the gravy, add a teaspoonful of catsup and a little lemon juice.

Liver Dumplings.—Chop half a pound of calf's liver, add a chopped onion, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, salt, pepper and a dash of nutmeg. Mix with two well-beaten eggs and one tablespoonful of butter. Add enough fine bread crumbs to form balls and boil in soup stock. Serve with the soup.

Wild Duck With Turnips.—Cut up the birds into neat pieces for serving, slice one large onion and one carrot. Melt four tablespoonfuls of butter in a saucepan and put in the duck and vegetables; cook until nicely browned. Strain off the fat, add a cupful of stock and one bay leaf, place in the oven and roast one hour. Peel eight turnips, cut four of them into quarters and fry brown in hot butter, add them to the duck to finish cooking. Boil the other turnips in salted water until soft, then mash, add butter, cream, salt and pepper to season. Take up the duck, remove the fat and thicken with flour, pour over the duck and serve. Wild rice is a delightful accompaniment to wild duck.

Seasonable Sandwiches.

A tasty, well made sandwich is welcome at any meal and is especially nice for an afternoon or a late supper tidbit.

Cream Cheese Sandwich.—Rub to a thick paste one cream cheese, one tablespoonful of butter, the sifted yolks of two hard cooked eggs, season with salt, paprika and a few grains of cayenne. Spread the mixture between crisp saltines, butter thins or wafers. Serve with dinner salad.

Egg, Pepper and Sardine Sandwiches.—Chop fine four hard cooked eggs, add two tablespoonfuls of finely chopped green and red pepper, one tablespoonful of minced parsley, two tablespoonfuls of finely minced chives, or onion, or a bit of grated garlic. Drain a large can of sardines, remove the skins and bones and finely mince, add to the first mixture and toss with a fork until well mixed. Add a teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice and moisten with mayonnaise. Spread on white bread, cut sandwiches in triangles.

Nut Bread and Cream Cheese Sandwiches.—Work a cream cheese with cream to the consistency to spread. Season with salt, paprika and a pinch of cayenne. Add one-third of a cupful of seeded layer raisins. Spread thinly sliced cut meats with creamed butter. Spread half the slices with the cream cheese mixture. Put together in pairs and cut into triangles. Press a seeded raisin on the top side of each sandwich. Serve with tea.

Hot Toasted Cheese Sandwiches.—Cut white bread into thin slices, toast lightly on one side, cover the untoasted side with a mild, soft cheese, sprinkle with cayenne, a bit of salt and set into a hot oven long enough to melt the cheese. Serve open on salad plates with lettuce and thousand isle dressing.

These sandwiches are very good fried lightly in butter, using the bread untoasted and the cheese as filling.

Extreme Tribute to Work

The happiest people are those who see stretching out before them more work than can ever be done.—Stuart P. Sherman.

CONVENIENCE IN DOING IRONING

Avoid Much Fatigue by Arranging Equipment.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

There's a world of difference in the way one feels at the end of a day's ironing, depending on whether you have used your head to save your back in managing the work, and on whether you have arranged your equipment in the best possible way for saving needless motions. For example, can you stand—or still better—sit in one place and reach both the basket of sprinkled clothes and the clothes horse that airs the finished work? Do you get everything ready before you begin, so that when once you get "into the swing" or ironing you can go straight ahead without interruption? And, speaking of interruptions, do you plan to do the ironing at the hours least subject to them? It's bad economy to heat up the irons, or the iron, as the case may be, and then iron a little while, with a stop in between for something else, so that the irons get cold and possibly the clothes get too dry. Much fatigue can be avoided, also, in connection with ironing, if you have previously given thought to the selection of the family clothing and the household linens to eliminate all unnecessary ironing. The flatter and plainer the garments the easier they are ironed; and the family will accept rough dry, smoothed-out sheets, turkish towels, crepe underwear and paper table linen if they realize that by doing so they are greatly lessening the time you have to spend ironing.

Built-in Ironing Board in a Western Farm Home.

The first thing to think of is the height and location of your ironing board with reference to your own height and the way you exert pressure from your shoulder, and also with reference to a good light on the work. Almost equal in importance is the smooth padding and covering of the board itself. Much has been said of the convenience of the built-in ironing board and the electric iron. The illustration, taken by the United States Department of Agriculture in a Utah farm home, shows a good arrangement for both of these conveniences in connection with a breakfast alcove. The folding ironing board is built into a small space in the wall. Light from the alcove falls over the worker's shoulder on the ironing board, and the nearby table and bench make it possible to sprinkle the clothes or sort the finished pieces easily, or pile up small flat work, like handkerchiefs or table napkins. Sprinkling is done more evenly and quickly, it may be said in passing, if you use a rubber spray head on a medium-sized bottle, or a clean, round whisk broom. There should be a folding clothes horse within reach of the worker for airing and drying the finished work, or some other convenient arrangement. Much of the ironing can be done sitting down if a high stool is provided.

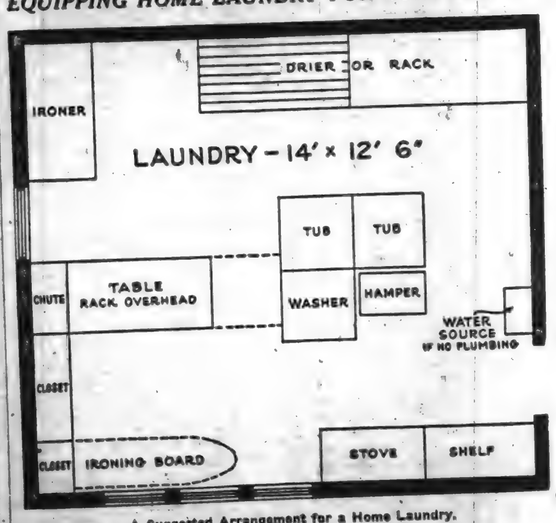
The electric iron is one of the best labor-saving devices now available. Buy from a reputable company equipped to make any needed repairs, and when purchasing see that the voltage corresponds to that supplied you by the local power plant. With proper care an electric iron will last a long time. Avoid dropping it, or pulling the plug out by the wire at either end, as this is apt to break the fine wires through which the connection is made. Always disconnect the iron when you are through using it, even for a short time, and stand it on end to cool. Store it in a clean, dry place. Examine the cord frequently for breaks. Sometimes these can be repaired with insulating tape. Irons put away for any length of time should be greased.

In a large family the heated ironing machine is often used in addition to or in place of the electric iron. As in purchasing other large pieces of equipment, it is wise to examine the various types on the market carefully before making a selection.

Frying Potatoes Right Way Is Fully Explained

Every home maker, of course, knows how to fry potatoes, but not every one seems to know how to fry them so that they will be brown, crisp and not greasy. For children, especially, foods should not be greasy and should have no suggestion of burned fat. Cooked potatoes can be browned quickly and easily in a little butter at rather low temperature, and for children this seems the best way of browning them. In any case, slow cooking in only a little fat makes a golden brown crust over the outside, while the inside remains soft and yet does not absorb the fat. Use a heavy skillet, let the pieces brown on one side before turning them, and cooking only enough at one time to cover the bottom of the skillet in a fairly thin layer, are three other fine points in frying potatoes to a turn.

EQUIPPING HOME LAUNDRY FOR CONVENIENCE



A Suggested Arrangement for a Home Laundry.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

If you possibly can, have a separate laundry room. It is very desirable to keep the handling of soiled clothing and the odors and steam of laundry work from the kitchen, where food is prepared.

The size of such a laundry depends on the number and size of the articles with which it is equipped. The accompanying floor plan was prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture. It shows a convenient arrangement of the standard pieces of equipment that have been found useful in the average sized family. The drier and ironer may be omitted without destroying the unity of the scheme. The larger table is so placed that it can be used for sorting the soiled clothes, and with the folding rack above, also furnishes a convenient place for the finished garments after they are ironed either on the board or on the ironer.

Arrangement of Tubs.

Sometimes the plumbing arrangements in the house demand that the tubs be left near the wall. A line drawn across the plan behind the tubs will show a good arrangement for such a situation, although the center position for the tubs is to be preferred. Hot and cold water can be piped to the tubs; or, if this is not possible, any other source of water may be located close at hand as indicated. The stove is placed near the washer, so that the clothes can be transferred easily if they are to be boiled. It is also near the shelf or small table for starching, and the ironing board, in case irons must be heated on it. The closet is located in the ironing area, but is very close to the washing equipment. The clothes chute, the supply closet, and the closet for the ironing board make a compact fixture if constructed as one unit.

Lighting and Ventilation.

Attention should be given to the lighting and ventilation of the laundry. The common practice of locating stationary tubs or trays under a basement window brings them so close to the wall that the light from a relatively high window does not strike them. If the window arrangement is poor, a good source of properly directed artificial light should be placed over each large piece of equipment. All electric wiring and devices should be properly insulated.

Doors and windows should be so placed as to give thorough ventilation. The walls should be painted or otherwise treated so that they are not affected by steam and are washable. They should be light in color. The floor should be of material that wears well, is not too hard for the feet, does not soak water or get slippery when wet, and is easily cleaned. Wood and concrete are most common.

A Trip To The Hawaiian Islands

As Described By Arthur R. Price, Caretaker At the Maumee Valley Fur Farm, Spencerville

Honolulu looms up as a city of tropical wonders when the traveler plans a trip to the Hawaiian Islands, the usual procedure is first a dream trip, one where a person loses himself in a book telling of these wonder islands, the Paradise of the Pacific as the natives like to have them called, but as soon as the first few pages are read, one finds himself dreaming, the print becomes the picture it is trying to describe, the imagination glows and the Islands can be seen, first the Cocoanut trees fringing the shore, some bowing toward the sea, others toward the beach, the beach can be none other than Wakiki, the surf-board riders are thrilling the spectators who sit under the Palm trees in the cool shade, in another direction we see the fields of sugar-cane, which, like the ocean, seems to continue until it reaches the horizon, as our vision carries us on, we see the fields of Pineapples, miles of it on both sides of the road, the Banana plantations make us stop in wonderment, the big bunches are hanging over and bending the twigs as though in an effort to break them, soon we arrive at the rice fields, the Chinaman stands behind his plow as the Water-Buffalo pulls his plow, we can hear the rumbling sound like thunder and as we look up we see an active volcano pouring out hot lava and clouds of smoke ascending to the sky. The fall of the book from our hands awakens us from our dream-trip, our desire to see in reality becomes aroused and the spark of curiosity is being fanned, then we say to ourselves, our next vacation is going to be a real one, two weeks at the seashore or the country as heretofore.

The time arrives soon thereafter we arise one morning to find that this is the day the steamer sails. The trunks have been packed and gone, we arrive at the dock and board our ocean liner, a relaxation at last, the steamer leaves the pier while friends say good-bye. We are now under way and headed for the Islands of enchantment that have gripped our imagination and stirred our spirit of romance. After a few days of romping the decks, watching the engines turn over, making friends and eating plenty of delicious food, we hear the word passed that tomorrow morning we will see Diamond-Head, the first sight of the Islands, a long night passes and as the day breaks we get our first glimpse only like a shadow at first, it's land, but better than that, it's the Hawaiian Islands. As we near the harbor of Honolulu a few Army airplanes come out to meet us roaring a greeting with the loud hum of the motors, as we near the pier, native boys swim alongside of the ship asking for coins. As the passengers throw a few coins in the water, the boys dive for them. To our surprise we hear a brass band playing Aloah-Lo, its the Governor's band that has been sent to welcome us all to the Islands as guests.

On landing we started for the hotel, its but a short walk as Honolulu is a water-front city, our eyes open wide for we notice we are walking on concrete streets. We also notice street-cars. As we near King street, we rub elbows with Japanese, Chinese and Philippinoes in their native dress. We pass Department stores, Drug stores, Cigar stores and Automobile salesrooms like they have on Broadway, N. Y. After arriving at our room in the hotel, we loosen our clothing, as the day is warm, even though it is the second day in February.

I took a chair to the window, sat down and looked over the city, smoke was arising from an iron-foundry, a few big concrete factories where they "can" pineapple were outstanding, rivet-hammers were clanking on big steel girders for new office buildings, bank buildings, etc. People were up and down the streets, everything was moving, a veritable bee-hive, a real commercial city.

The dreams that lead us on, started to melt like a piece of ice under a flame of heat. It has all been a mistake. I might have known there was a "hitch" in it somewhere. Haven't I just left this kind of a place a few days ago? Haven't I been sick of cities with their noise and hum-drum of business? What I wanted was romance, the thrill of adventure, and like the book-author quoted, "to feel the red-blood tingling through your veins." Mr. Adventurer, don't feel disappointed, there is a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

We arise early the next morning, and after breakfast, we take a stroll along the streets, a man standing near a sight-seeing automobile notices our strange faces and says, "Aound the Island trip, Sir, a full day of sight-seeing," this sounds encouraging and we decide to make a trip. A few minutes later we find ourselves winding up a hill. After reaching the top we alight, the chauffeur then plays his dual-role, first as a careful driver and second as a talker, which he readily admits as being good at explaining as tourists repeatedly have told him so.

We first center our attention on an empty crater this our chauffeur explains has become extinct and the University of Hawaii proposes to use it for a football bowl.

The ocean can be seen dotted with Japanese fishing boats known as Sampans. The famous Pearl Harbor Navy Yard can be seen also the dry dock that was dug in Coral. We gaze up the inland part of the island as our chauffeur points and says that is miles of sugar cane; that is pineapples growing; that is rice fields and those are banana plantations. We breathe deep, our dreams awaken and our hopes are renewed. We become a little uneasy and then express a desire to start for these wonders so we soon find ourselves whizzing along a road, sugar cane growing on both sides for miles. The first stop is the sugar mill and they welcome tourists as all other business houses do. One of the workers showed us around and explained the process of squeezing the syrup from the cane and drying it in cylinders until it becomes a flakey dry brown. Our next stop was right out on the open road. We knew it was rice field as there is the Chinaman with his water-Buffalo and plow just as the book described. Within a stones throw banana plantations started, the chauffeur was a little humorous to saying that the banana ground is beng bought up and sugar cane will take its place then the Hawaiians will be singing "Yes, we have no bananas."

The wireless masts from the Navy Yards could be seen projecting 300 feet in the air, this being the same aerial that Alexander Graham Bell heard the first verse carried over the Pacific and the West direct to Arlington, Va., some 5,000 miles. Mr. Bell exclaimed, "I am convinced that nothing is impossible." On our way back to the city we stopped at Bishop's Museum and looked at the implements of warfare as well as cooking utensils that the old Hawiians used before the civilized white man came and introduced jazz, nut sundaes and one piece bathing suits.

The hotel bulletin board showed that there is to be an Hawaiian Feast at one of the local houses followed by several native dances by the well known Hula Hula Girls and as nothing of interest was to pass us by, after a wash up at the hotel we went to thefeast. All was ready and with many other visitors we ate like Hawaiians of old with our fingers of course. First we had Poii, one of the most famous Hawaiians dishes to this day. It looked like brown paste and it tasted like it. Chicken was served as well as steamed pig, vegetables, clams, crabs, and cocoanut was very attentive in a true Hawaiian manner as he wanted everybody to be pleased. One person asked how he steamed pig and he exclaimed that small stones are heated in a fire, when the pig is cleaned its stomach is loaded with hot stones and sewed up, the entire pig is wrapped in banana leaves, the moisture of the body and the heat of the stones create steam thereby steaming the meat until it is cooked. The banana leaves keep in the steam and add to its flavor. When the chef reached me I thought I had a sticker for him saying that the food was delicious but asked, where are the tooth picks? He pointed to the crab claws and said "That is what we use for tooth picks."

The music started and the Hula Hula girls made their appearance. These dances were not of the vulgar type that we were used to seeing at smokers at home, the dancers were very graceful and the dances were pleasing.

The next day we inquired at the Chamber of Commerce how we might get to the volcanoes where the Hawaiian National Park was. On receiving the information we left that evening for an over night boat trip to the island of Hawaii.

Honolulu by the way is on the island of Oahu. The next morning we arrived at the port of Hilo. The automobile trip to the volcano took us almost all morning, a long up-hill drive. Here we got our first close-up of the giant ferns, tropical vegetation and the forests that have been buried from lava flows, the air gradually became cooler and finally we arrived at the Kilauea volcano. A cozy little hotel stands at the road overlooking the immense crater. It looked like an immense bowl five miles long and three miles wide. The pit where the lava originates is what we were headed for. On the floor of the crater was dry lava which had become cool and hard. As it dried or cooled it held its original shape resembling a choppy sea. We hiked a distance of three miles over this hard lava and it was like walking on frozen snow having a tendency to give under our feet. The pit was reached and we lay on our stomachs and looked down into it seeing the hot lava rolling over and under with an occasional sputter and volumes of steam burst forth. A government guide told us that the best sight was at night so we made a second trip. Here was a sight of a lifetime. Lava continued to roll, sputter and send out jets of steam, but it was night and the hot lava showed its colors as it rolled from underneath. The color was of a bright red glow as it neared the top of the roll it rapidly changed to various hues of red until it became a golden color. The whole pit of lava kept doing that.

It seemed like an Arabian Fantasy Story of looking into the ball of wizardry and seeing the activity of the inside of this planet we live on.

At the hotel they had baths of live steam, passing through crack in the ground into the bath room of the hotel. This natural steam flowed unceasingly and is undoubtedly one of the most unique baths known.

The government has sectioned off a vast space of land and made a National Park, the Kilauea Volcano is included in it. There are golf links, tennis courts, hunting, saddle horses for hire, etc. Another thrill had presented itself, there were wild goats up in the mountains. It was an all year round open season for hunting, saddle horses and guns could be had. After getting a few young fellows together we planned an all-day hunting trip for wild goats. As the day broke the next morning we started off on horse-back, each man with a rifle. A guide accompanied us to show us the paths and the places where the wild goats usually grazed. We reached a peak on the mountain which afforded a commanding view of the land below and far out in the distance the ocean could be seen, the sun had not shown itself as yet but the bright rays were beaming. We stood in silence awaiting the rise of the sun, the air was cool and refreshing and the smell of the green grass made us breathe deep. The never failing sun of Hawaii soon popped up out of the ocean and this was our signal to be off again.

The paths were rough and broken but the rugged saddle horses stood the uphill trot with wonderful stamina. When reaching the giant Koah tree, which has been a land mark for centuries, we stopped to rest. We looked to the top of the mountain and it was snow capped, an extreme contrast of sugar cane and pineapples growing at the bottom of the mountan and eternal ice on the top of the same mountain. We got started again on the last lap of the journey. Our guide informed us that we would soon be near the ground that the wild goats inhabited but not to shoot until he told us to. It wasn't very long before the first herd of wild goats were sighted. The wind was blowing toward us and it gave us the advantage of getting close before the goats heard the sound of the horses hoof. We spread out and agreed not to fire until the goats seen us and started to run. This plan was carried out. We got within 500 yards when we were sighted and a stampede started. We opened fire but after two rounds, our game were all scatered into the hedges and under-brush. I've seen domestic goats trot a little but I never knew before that wild goats could race like a deer. We rounded up the goats we had hit and found six of them scattered in different directions. Not bad for four amateur hunters and only a dozen shots fired.

The Hawaiian Islands are undoubtedly one of the most wonderful possessions for scenery that the United States has. The export of sugar cane and pineapple amounted to over one hundred million dollars during the past year. There is no unemployment and the working class enjoy living conditions much the same as we people do here. The majority of the labor is done by Japanese. If you notice a house being built, you will see Japanese carpenters, brick layers, painters, plumbers, paper hangers etc. Many of the stores are conducted by Chinese and Japanese. They are faithful workers and pride themselves with their honesty.

Children of various creeds and races romp to school each morning like our own children do. Although many of the Chinese and Japanese women still wear their native dress on the streets. The children wear the same kind of clothing as the white children. The social attitude toward each other is very orderly and these Orients are good law abiding citizens. They have plowed the fields, sown the seeds, reaped the harvest of sugar-cane and pineapple, even pack the products and stow it away on ships to be sent to the far corners of the earth.

The Christmas spirit is the same as we possess. The stores have a varied display of toys and the children of the Orient are out on the streets on Christmas morning playing with their American made toys. Both the Y. W. C. A. and the Y. M. C. A. have beautiful buildings. There are ever so many schools, also the University of Hawaii.

When considering an extenaive trip, visit the Hawaiian Islands. It will be an event never-to-be-forgotten.

LOCAL ITEMS IN BRIEF.

Uncle Sam Is Growing Japanese Snails

The demand for small Japanese snails which are sometimes kept in aquariums has increased greatly in the last few years. At one time all of these snails had to be imported from Germany, but now Arthur J. Poole of the national museum in Washington has started a snail farm. He started last spring with six adult snails which have now increased by two hundred. By the time next spring rolls around Mr. Poole expects to be an important factor in the snail market.

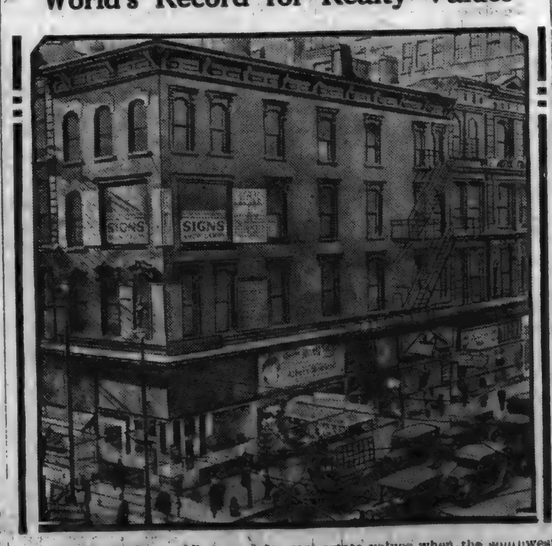
World's Record for Realty Values



Chicago set the world's record for real estate values when the southwest corner of Clark and Madison streets, shown above, was leased for ninety-nine years by the trustees of the Levi Leiter estate to a Boston syndicate. The net annual rental of $150,000 capitalized on the customary basis of 5 per cent, gives a leasing value of $3,000,000. This is at the rate of $488 a square foot valuation, reported to be $60 a square foot more than the property at Forty-second street and Broadway, New York city.

YOUTHFUL BLACK VELVET COATS; FITS FOOTWEAR TO THE COSTUME

COATS which express elegant mode through the medium of velvet are more and more making appeal to women of smart fashion. Paris is saying in regard to the velvet coat of youthful aspect, "black with a touch of color." Just how beautifully the thought may be worked out is demonstrated in this picture of a typically French velvet coat mode. The designer of this adorable garment elects to apply color to cuffs and pocket only, choosing nattier blue suede cloth for the purpose. As if to call attention to the fact madam elaborates the scheme with myriads of scallops positioned row overlapping row. Which is a very clever and proper thing to do considering that one of fashion's commands this season is to the effect that pockets and cuffs on winter coats must be unique and interesting.

The prevalence of velvet in both day and evening attire becomes a matter of important style significance. Silhouetted against fashion's background are costumes of every genre from chic two-piece short-jacket suits to picturesque robes de style, not to mention daytime frocks of every type, also evening wraps of utmost elaborateness.

Special emphasis is placed on afternoon frocks of two-piece theme. These usually have metal cloth or brocade tops with velvet skirts.

A development in present styling is plaited chiffon velvet. Skirts are often treated in rather small side plaits. Of course this evidences the fine suppleness of modern velvet.

A last moment item in fashion's report, is the use of white fur with black velvet. The revival of the white fox scarf is an interesting outcome of this new movement.

Relating of footwear to color and fabric of the costume is the expressed sentiment of the mode. To be sure, it is costing milady a pretty penny to live up to this new whim of fashion. But what if small fortunes be wafted away on beauty's feet; to attain sartorial perfection one must pay the price.

From Paris comes re-affirmation of the vogue for wearing matching leathers, preferably belts, bags and shoes. Colored suede, pigskin and baby calf are given particular mention, also reptile leathers worked up in combination with solid colors. The compose theme is gaining a momentum which forecasts for spring a vogue for fanciful footwear and accessories intriguingly interworked with various leathers.

New-type footwear is strikingly illustrated in the smart sports shoes in this picture. For their making, parchment kidskin is co-partnered with brown alligator.

Typical French Velvet Coat.

Nothing in the way of a daytime dress shoe supersedes buckled colonials. In fact, any type of footwear that can be worn with buckles is popular.

The mode declares a trend toward handsome black shoes as well as those of color. Those of ebony kidskin—the name Paris gives to dull-finished leather—are of foremost style prestige. The picture shows a typical French costume all in the fashionable black. Patou creates this daytime frock of black rep, trimming it with a huge flat satin bow on the left side. Black shoes of ebony kidskin give to this costume the cachet of ultra-smartness. Lest monotone black appear too somber for a young person, the flat thumb-strap bag has been selected in gray kid banded in snakeskin of the same tones, carrying out the gray of the hose and the light flecks in the fur piece.

Russian boots as shown in this picture are regarded by the younger element as quite the thing for daytime wear.

How His Mind Works

Many Upstrokes, Superfluous Talk.

"He is very intelligent!" When we say this about a person we should say in what way he is intelligent, for some of us may be very intelligent about stocks and bonds, but ignorant about ethics and things of the spirit.

The logical, trained thinker who reasons and bases his conclusions on sound foundations which he sees with his physical eyes, leaves interesting things behind him in his writing. He leaves off most of the upstrokes to his letters, beginning such letters as u, m, n, etc., with a down stroke instead of an unnecessary upstroke. His trained mind does not care for superfluities.

The person who pens an upstroke to nearly every letter beginning will talk all around a thing, but will not get "down to business"—will tell every unnecessary detail about some relative's relatives until the real story has been forgotten. Such a mind cannot make decisions quickly, nor shoulder much responsibility. The constantly intelligent person keeps the same slope to his writing throughout. Too much change indicates moods and emotions ruling.

One may be very intelligent in intuitive ways also, where ideas come as inspirations or "hunches." Such people write very often with many disconnected letters. The writing is usually light, and the d's and t's looped and high. Such people do not know how they reach their conclusions, yet they cannot be argued away from them. They feel them "physically."

More About Those Emotions

It is an interesting thing to note a person's letter (if it is written on unruled paper) to see if his emotions rule him, causing him ups and downs in life, or whether his head and single goal in life are steadily and calmly guiding him.

If his writing hews to the line, without ups and downs, he will "stay in his own back yard" digging away steadily at his task, persevering, and careful in his work. Scientists and detail workers hew to the line, without flashy ups and downs, while actors, dramatic salesmen, and quick inspirationalists will get off this line, feeling "way up" with this person and "way down" with that other one.

Do not expect the lover who writes an inflexible base line to learn dancing instantly, or to propose the first night. Do not expect the lover whose writing bobs up and down to become a successful bookkeeper all at once. He will become ill first, from suppression and restlessness, and irritability in such a position.

And the perfect copy book writer seldom becomes a creative artist or powerful writer. He is a better follower of other people's ideas.

Domestic troubles come from these differences of emotions in each other. If understood, the troubles vanish. The prosaic husband who loves in his own way should not be condemned for failing to enthuse, while the romantic one should be responded to and be given sufficient mental interest at home, instead of jealousies and scoldings, if we wish to keep his love.

Note.—Do not make final judgment until other signs in writing are studied.

Character in Business

Character is playing more and more importance in business, both from the side of the management and the side of the employee. Once every effort was made to obtain efficiency. While efficiency is an end of business today, the realization of the need for character has come to be a foremost thought of corporation leaders.—Thrift Magazine.

THE ENGAGEMENT RING

By W. E. LLOYD

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"AND you start for West Africa tomorrow?"

Bransome felt that the question was like an unwritten doom. He looked at Mary Starr in the moonlight as they stood outside Colonel Starr's conservatory.

Bransome had known Mary for five months. Colonel Starr, in whose regiment he was now a captain, had taken a liking to the young man when they were posted at Malta, and had invited him to his home in England. Now Bransome, with the rank of acting major, was to leave for West Africa to put down the rebellion of the Kru tribe in the recesses of the forests. And he loved Mary.

But he knew that she was engaged to Lionel Travis, the political agent among the Krus, who had made his escape to the coast after sanguinary fighting.

Yet they loved, and love was stronger than honor at that moment. They gravitated toward each other, and stood looking at each other, not daring to speak lest they betray themselves.

"If I meet Travis—" began Bransome at length.

"Yes?" Her word was like a caress.

"What shall I tell him?"

Mary took the solitaire from her finger. "Give him this," she said softly.

Bransome, incredulous, clasped her in his arms and their lips met. "You love me, dearest?" he murmured.

"I have loved you since we met. It is wrong, but it is better than a marriage that shall wrong Lionel and myself, too."

Before Bransome departed it was understood that they were engaged. And Lionel Travis' ring reposed in Bransome's pocket to be handed to the agent if they met. Bransome would affect ignorance of the contents of the little box. It was a cruel mission, but there was no way of getting a letter to Travis, who might be in any part of the coast.

Bransome sailed the following day, and fifteen days later arrived with his regiment at the coast town. All the interior was in a ferment. The regiment was sent up hastily to the base, where it halted while the pioneers cut roads through the forest. And it was there that Bransome met Travis.

He was to accompany the column as political delegate to the loyal tribes. The two men met, greeted each other warmly, though Bransome naturally showed something of constraint. Travis lunched in the mess, and they smoked their cigars together afterward. When Travis rose to depart to his quarters Bransome spoke of Mary Starr for the first time.

"She asked me to give you this," he said, handing him the little box containing the ring.

"Thanks!" said Travis indifferently, and slipped it into his pocket.

The column started a day or two later, Travis accompanying it. Often the men exchanged words. Bransome would look curiously at Travis, but he could gather nothing from the agent's inscrutable countenance.

There was, however, little time for thinking. On the sixth day the enemy's stronghold was sighted. The messenger who went forward with a summons to surrender was met with defiant shouts from the negroes. Half an hour later the seven-pounder opened fire on the rebel stockade.

A fusillade of elephant guns followed, but few of the attacking party were hit. Presently the guns ceased; a breach had been made in the strong walls built of hardwood logs and almost as resistant as cement and mortar.

The regiment spread out in line. Bransome ran before them, waving his sword. "Advance!" he shouted.

Then he saw Travis beside him in his civilian clothes. The agent's white solar helmet made a splendid mark for an enemy. "Go back, you fool!" Bransome shouted.

But Travis ran beside him, and Bransome had no time for argument. The whole line followed, with fixed bayonets, roaring behind him. The bullets churned among the trees, and cut splinters from the boughs. Showers of leaves came down.

The yelling, defiant Krus manned the walls of the breached stockade. The assaulting party was compelled to form into column to mount the breach. And now the enemy displayed its secret resource, nothing less than an old brass ship's gun, which might have done service in the sixties, and was none the less effective here. A roaring detonation, and grape shot burst among the British troops. They fell in heaps, cut down by the well-directed charge.

But the gun was, of course, not a quick-firer, and had to be reloaded. The troops closed up. Bransome, who had by some miracle escaped unscathed, put himself at their head again. "Advance!" he shouted.

And again he was conscious of Travis in his white helmet, cool and smiling beside him.

It was a mad rush toward the walls. Just as the foremost man set foot in the breach the cannon roared again. The flies were swept away. And again Bransome found himself uninjured.

"Now, boys!" he shouted, amazed to find that he was still alive.

The attacking party, which had recoiled, heaped one man against his neighbor, and, the dead all about, rushed forward, cheering. Like a cataract the khaki-clad column swept over the breach, driving the dogged negroes before them, pinioning them with the bayonet. In a moment the fort was carried.

From hut to hut the flying Krus were pursued. They fell in writhing heaps, their own gun turned against them. For perhaps half an hour the bloody struggle lasted. Then the British were in possession of the village.

Bransome stopped. He had forgotten everything in the excitement of the battle. His sword was bloody, and yet he could not remember having struck down a man. A trickle of blood was running down his face. He limped from a slug in his leg that he had never felt.

He posted his men in various quarters; this done, he remembered Travis.

"Where's Travis?" he demanded of his surviving captain.

The agent could not be found. Yet it was Travis who represented the majesty of the British raj, and it was Travis who must interview the trembling old king now a prisoner in his own mud hut, guarded by a sullen, defiant chief wife, and a younger one, who held the royal red parasol over him.

Bransome went back, searching among the fallen. Travis was not in the town; he was not anywhere within the fort. Bransome came upon him at last just outside the breach. He had been struck down by a dozen slugs from the brass cannon the second time the weapon was discharged. Travis lay under a pile of dark Krus, but he was alive. He recognized Bransome.

Bransome hailed the stretcher-bearers and had two men place him upon a stretcher and carry him into the town. They brought him to the king's hut, and Travis pronounced sentence. The king was to go into exile to the coast, to spend the last of his days there.

The surgeon came up, looked at the agent and shook his head. "There may be a chance for him," he said. "Get him out of here. Put him in a hut that hasn't been used. There's smallpox everywhere among the Krus."

Travis did not catch smallpox, but it became clear, after a week of delirium, that he was dying. His mind grew clear toward the end. He motioned to Bransome to open the little satchel he carried with the government papers.

Bransome did so, and found in it the little box containing Mary's ring. He looked at Travis and saw that the agent's eyes were fixed upon it. He put it in Travis' hand.

With fingers that almost failed him Travis slowly pulled off the cover and held up the diamond ring. It was incongruous to see the gem sparkling in the dying man's wasted hand. Travis motioned to Bransome to bend down.

"The engagement ring I gave her," he whispered. "She is as true as gold, old man."

"Yes," agreed Bransome.

"We were to have been married when this cursed business was over. Now we shall never marry. I want you to marry her, Bransome. You're about the only man that's fit for her."

Bransome winced and tried not to show the emotion on his features. But Travis was too far gone to see anything except the face of Mary Starr that floated before him.

"I wrote to her, telling her how I longed for her in the silence of the brush," Travis whispered. "I said I had looked at her photograph and her mementos again and again. I wanted something else to bring her vividly before my eyes. And she—she sent me this. Nothing could have been a truer pledge of her love. A girl doesn't like to part with her engagement ring, Bransome."

"No," Bransome agreed.

And the irony of the situation struck into his soul. Travis had lived in the belief that his sweetheart was true to him, and he would die not knowing what the return of the ring meant.

They buried him the following dawn under a cairn of stones. And Bransome, having done his duty to the dead, allowed his thoughts to turn toward the living. The past seemed obliterated—at least it seemed to be symbolized in the gem that sparkled in the dead hand under the damp soil of Africa.

Wire-Drawing Machine Marvel of Ingenuity

In the manufacture of certain kinds of wire, especially fine aluminum wire, a machine is used that is surprisingly similar to the spinning apparatus in a modern cotton mill. In fact, it is a mechanical twister, by which the wire is separated from what might be called the supply coil into strands of the requisite thickness and wound upon spools. The supply coil passes over a pulley above the spindles and through what might be called a drawing frame. From this it is carried to the spools of a certain size. From these it passes through a second drawing frame, which decreases its diameter, again winding it on spools, the third drawing frame turning it into the size required for commercial use.

While some of the machines will draw out enough wire to fill 20 spools at once, so complete and so simple is the mechanism that but one person is needed to attend each machine.

POULTRY

POINTS MARKING PROFITABLE HENS

Characters that mark the best producing hens are most in evidence during the fall of the year.

Hens molting during July, August, or September, are poor layers as a rule. Early molters are slow molters, their production period being of only short duration. The late molter is a quick molter; she has a long period of production.

A hen to lay well must have a sound body. The first consideration, then, must be vigor and health.

Good layers of yellow-shanked breeds usually show well-faded beaks, legs, and toes at this time of year; while the poor layer will have the yellow beak and shanks.

The laying hen has good width of back and depth of body, and a large abdominal region. The skin is soft and pliable; the vent large and moist. The pelvic bones are spread well apart and are thin and pliable. There is usually three or four finger widths between the pelvic bones and the end of the keel bone. The hen that has stopped laying will show a collection of fat in the abdominal region. The skin will lack pliability and the pelvic bones will show but very little space between them.

When laying, or getting ready to lay, the comb and wattles are well developed and bright red. When not laying the comb and wattles shrink and become covered with a white scale.

Hens of the heavier breeds that persist in broodiness should be culled. Mark the broody hen with a colored leg band every time she is found broody. Cull all those that become broody more than once. Always cull a broody hen of the lighter breeds.—O. C. Ufford, Assistant Professor in Animal Husbandry, Colorado Agricultural College.

Plenty of Green Feed for Hens Is Important

The importance of plenty of green feed for hens has long been known and appreciated, but the average farmer who keeps perhaps 100 hens has been slow to make much of an effort to provide anything like an adequate supply for his hens during the winter months. The poultry experts at Ohio state experiment station, realizing that a regular supply of green feed is difficult to obtain, at least for a great many farmers, set out to find a substitute.

Alfalfa, red clover, and soy bean hays were tested out and all gave excellent results. Almost every farmer can easily provide some one of these feeds for his hens, and he will find it greatly to his advantage to do so. The hay should be cut green and well cured, and it will be palatable to the hens only if it retains its green color.

The hens will eat more of it if the hay is cut into short lengths, but they will eat a large amount of uncut hay. It has been customary on some farms to feed the leafy scatterings of alfalfa and clover hays that accumulate on the barn floor, indicating that some people have appreciated the value of this feed for a long time.

Poultry Notes

Keep the ventilator at work so that the air will be fresh and pure.

• • •

Gather the eggs often and do not let freeze. Market at least once a week during the cold months.

• • •

Success in getting a good egg yield depends to a great extent upon the proper selection of the laying stock.

• • •

You simply cannot make a first-class meat fowl out of a Leghorn any more than you can produce beef that will top the market from a dairy cow. Leghorns, as a rule, have to be sold to a cheap trade.

• • •

If any birds in the flock develop colds, put as much potassium permanganate as will remain on the surface of a dime into a gallon of water and keep this mixture in their drinking water for several days.

• • •

Have plenty of ventilation in the poultry houses and let as much sunlight in as is possible, but do not allow drafts to exist.

• • •

Put aside a few bales of fourth-cutting alfalfa for the hens to pick at this winter. Do not bother to remove the wires as there will be less waste if bales remain tied.

• • •

Fortunately, feeds such as milk, mash, green food and minerals, that produce winter eggs, also help in producing good hatching eggs.

• • •

During the winter the hens will need a larger proportion of grain because some of it must be used for body heat.

• • •

Sodium fluoride is safe to use on hens to kill lice and seems to be the most generally recommended of all the louse-killing materials.

• • •

Lime builds bones, and one glass of milk contains as much lime as a loaf and a half of white bread, or nine potatoes, or five and one-third pounds of beef, or eight eggs.

PROPOSED MANDATORY VOTING BILL FAVORED

Fines Would Be Assessed Against All Persons in Indiana Who Failed To Go To Polls

Indianapolis, Dec. 28.—Mrs. Ella Van Sickle Gardner, elected a member of the house of representatives from Marion county, who recently announced she was planning to introduce a bill to make voting in primaries and elections compulsory, has received a letter from Wilbur F. Wakeman, of New York, congratulating her on the stand she has taken.

Wakeman in his letter included a copy of a resolution he said was presented to the Union League Club of New York on the subject of mandatory voting. The resolution pointed out that less than 50 per cent of the American electorate had voted in the last two national elections. It is the duty, and should be the pleasure, of every qualified citizen to be represented in his own government, the resolution continued.

The resolution placed the club on record as advocating legislation by every state for mandatory registration and voting. The suggestion was made that the voter who fails to go to the polls shall be fined and shall be the first to be called for jury duty.

Mrs. Gardner said she has heard favorable comments from a number of persons on her proposal for the compulsory voting law in Indiana. Her plan is to provide some kind of penalty for persons entitled to vote and who fail to do so. She has not yet determined definitely the type of penalty, she said. Mrs. Gardner has taken an active interest in politics and elections since the franchise was granted to women.

"BEN-HUR" COMING TO FORT WAYNE

Do you remember when "Ben-Hur" the stage play first came to Fort Wayne and a human chain of ticket buyers stood in line all night waiting for the box-office to open?

Now a new and greater "Ben-Hur" is coming to Fort Wayne, beginning an engagement at the Shrine Auditorium on Sunday afternoon, December 26, in celebration of the first anniversary of this exquisitely appointed interior where everybody can enjoy the greatest motion picture spectacle ever projected. A symphony orchestra of twenty selected musicians and special musical score add to the beauty of the picture.

The magnificent chariot race is real. The race takes place in a vast circus arena—the knightly Ramon Navarro and the wicked Francis X. Bushman being the opposing heroes. You see forty-eight horses—twelve teams—start abreast in their mad rush over the seven laps of the Antioch race-course and you cannot forbear a cheer as Ben-Hur wrecks Messala and forges to the front.

Among the leading actors are Ramon Novarro, in the title role; Francis X. Bushman as Massala; May McAvoy as Esther; Betty Bronson, Carmel Myers, Frank J. Currier, Mitchell Lewis, Nigel de Brulier, Claire McDowell, Kathleen Key, and no less than 150,000 persons in the supporting ensembles.

The "Ben-Hur" production was made in Italy and California. It was directed by Fred Niblo. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, in arrangement with A. L. Erlanger, Charles Dillingham and Florenz Zeigfeld Jr. have made a new and greater "Ben-Hur" in the newer art of the motion picture.

The engagement is for one week with daily matinees. All seats reserved.

A LITTLE TALK ON THRIFT

Now is a good time to make plans for th coming year. No matter what ideas are incorporated in these plans they should include some provision for the systematic saving of money.

Many persons make resolves of this kind each year, hold to their resolutions for a while and then let them go.

Quite often this is due less to instability of character than to defective planning. It is as much a mistake to try to save beyond one's means as it is to try to live beyond one's means.

There are rightful and necessary demands made upon every individual. If we try to save too much, especially if we are beginners in thrift, we court failure. The amount to be saved is a matter of adjustment. The man who has never saved money will find that he can save more the second year on the same income than he was able to save the first. This is because, with the development of thrift habits, he not only finds it easier to restrict his extravagance and unessentials, but he finds his efficiency increased. He develops short cuts. He learns that, with ingenuity, he can attain the same results often at less cost than when he was not under self-discipline.

It is for these reasons that every savings plan should be based on the idea of systematic accumulation. There is little value in sporadic saving but there is incalculable merit in putting aside specified amounts regularly regardless of how inconsequential they may be.

Plan your savings for the coming year along sensible lines. Adjust them to your income and to the conditions of life about you. Goethe observed that "enthusiasm is of the greatest value when we are not carried away by it." This can be applied to saving money as to everything else in life. Even in thrift there is harm of over-enthusiasm.

This is only a reminder to our St. Joe citizens at the beginning of the year, a time when it is easy to make new starts. You say these are all good, but unless you make an attempt at the saving, you will reap no reward. Do something now that you will be glad you started when another year rolls around.

Looking Back For 50 Years

Fifty years ago this year a national banking system was started in the United States.

Today Americans have on deposit and subject to check or drawing interest the unheardof sum of $60,000,000,000

If you do not own a part of that vast sum, you can still profit through the experience of others. You can still make your dollars wor for you—and a working dollar is the only dollar worth having.

Or you can do your boy or girl a wonderful favor by taking even one dollar and starting an account for them—and then teaching them how thrift and saving has made thee United States the most prosperous, the most contented, the happiest nation in the world.

FISH AND GAME CLUB BANQUET LAST WEEK

The annua pest hunt under the auspices of the Fish and Game Club of St. Joe, is now a matter of history and the side Merwood Rhoads was captain of was defeated in the final count.

The banquet was given the winners at the school house on Wednesday evening, last week, at which thirty-five participated.

The feed consisted of Parker house rolls and weiners, potato salad, fruit salad, oysters in any style, crackers, coffee, pickles, mints and cake.

O. E. Ginther was spokesman talking between courses Albert Caskey and Clare Hull furnished music on the violin and piano.

The boys remarked that on the night hunts for pests that O. E. Ginther would never climb because his feet hurt, but would search the straw stacks for sparrows, being easier on his feet.

Ed Storer, in his excitement for sparrows, would hold on with one hand and catch sparrows in one hand and bite their heads off.

Ray Reasoner fell ten feet in one mow in his rush to catch sparrows. The mow had been cut down and he did not see it, consequently he fell, lighting on his back without injury other than a good shaking up.

S. R. Eaten, of Pendleton, Ind., representing the Educational Department of Conservation, said in his opening remarks that no one form of life can be extinguished without effecting some other.

The Warden Department of Indiana is the only branch of state that is self supporting. No taxes of any kind goes to maintaining the work of conservation. The state has fifty-five wardens, five hatcheries with sixty-six ponds and in 1926 they distributed 10,691,700 baby fish of all kinds to the streams of Indiana.

Last year 212,674 licenses were issued.

Speaking of pests, the domestic cat is placed at the head of the list. There are five million cats in the United States and each cat is credited with catching a least fifty song birds, and in thehunt next year he recommended puting the cat on the list. There are seventy different kinds of sparrows. The average seed eating bird will consume at leamt $1.00 worth of seed in a year, thus we can see what the cat means by way of destruction, catching at least two and a half million of our best birds annually.

At the Samuel High farm, the English Starling was reported by members of the party and Mr. Eaten says they are worse than the sparrow. This is the seventh report of this bird this year in the state and they will endeavor to capture these birds and send to state office for specimen. They are of an inrdescent black, spotted like a pea fowl with eye spots of buff, about the size of a blackbird.

The first Friday night in February will be election of officers.

New Clothes for Old Ones

If the old house isn't just right, why not bring it up to present-day standards by a little of the right kind of remodeling and repair?

Perhaps you will need to put in a permanent concrete foundation and basement floor and renew porches and steps with concrete in the spring.

Another big improvement, the most effective modernizing touch, will be an overcoat of Universal cement stucco, applied right over the old walls, whatever they are. You'll worry less about fire, repairs and painting, and besides the winters will be more mild to the folks living inside.

Just ask for suggestions and get a free copy of our booklet, "Recommended Practice for Portland Cement Stucco."

A LETTER FROM MACON, GEORGIA

Mr. and Mrs. Ern Baxter, former St. Joe residents, but of later years of Butler, are now residents of Macon, Georgia, going last year. We are reproducing a letter that Mr. Baxter wrote to A. S. Powers, Editor of Herald at Butler, knowing that St. Joe folks would be glad to hear from the Baxters. The letter was written December 22nd, as follows:—

"Well I hear you are having some winter up there, brr brr! We are having about the weather you have in September and fore part of October. Once in a while frost, lowest was 24.8 degrees above of course. Had ice one 3-32 of an inch thick, but our roses and geraniums have their leaves yet, the hedge is still green and if you can remember as far back as last July 4, fire crackers and cap pistols, well they use them down here the same way on and about Christmas time. It has been going on now for about a week.

Lesson for January 9

THE STANDARD OF CHRISTIAN LIVING

LESSON TEXT—Luke 6:27-38.
GOLDEN TEXT—Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.
PRIMARY TOPIC—How Jesus Wants Us to Live.
JUNIOR TOPIC—Marching Orders for Christians.
INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—What Christ Requires of Us.
YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—Christ's Life and Example for Us.

The context (v. 20) clearly implies what is elsewhere positively declared (John 15:18-21; Luke 21:17) that the followers of Christ will be hated and opposed. In this lesson Christ sets forth the principles governing the life of his followers.

I. "Love Your Enemies" (v. 27).

Love here is not a natural affection. To love friends is easy, but to love enemies is only possible to those who have been made partakers of the divine nature—been born again.

II. "Do Good to Them Which Hate You" (v. 27).

Love is positive in its nature. The true Christian will not merely refrain from doing injury to one who hates him, but will be concerned with and engaged in doing good to him. True love acts according to its own essential nature.

III. "Bless Them That Curse You" (v. 28).

To bless means to speak well of—to invoke a blessing upon. Injury by words is hard to let go unchallenged. The one who is a child of God and allows the Spirit of his Maker and Redeemer to express itself through him will return blessings to cursings.

IV. "Pray for Them Which Despitefully Use You" (v. 28).

We should pray for those who abuse us. The best commentary on this precept is Christ's own example (Luke 23:34), "Father forgive them for they know not what they do." When Christ was reviled He reviled not again. When He suffered, He threatened not, but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously. (I Pet. 2:23).

V. Patiently Endure Wrong and Injury" (v. 29).

The Christian is not to bristle in defense of his rights but rather to suffer insult, injury and even loss. This expresses the law which should govern the individual's actions, but should not be pressed so far that evildoers can go unchecked. Rightly constituted government has been ordained of God for the protection of the innocent and the punishment of evildoers (Rom. 13:1-8).

VI. Give to Every One That Asketh of Thee (v. 30).

God is the supreme example. He gives freely and generously but intelligently. This text does not authorize indiscriminate giving. There is a giving which injures the one to whom the gift is made. To give a man money to buy whisky would be wrong.

VII. Do as You Wish to Be Done By (v. 31).

This is called the Golden Rule. It is the sum total of Christian duty as it pertains to human interrelations. Human beings carry with them the consciousness which is the touchstone which teaches them their duty to others. If men were to live up to this rule the problem of capital and labor would be solved and end would be put to war. International relations would be peaceably adjusted and all profiteering in business would end. Practicing this precept proves that we are children of God. Loving those who love us, doing good to those who do good to us, lending to those who lend to us, is the common practice even among sinners. No new birth, no Holy Spirit needed to live this kind of life.

VIII. Be Merciful (v. 36).

This means to be filled with pity and compassion. To enter into sympathy with every need of others. The supreme example as to this is the Heavenly Father.

IX. Censorious Judgments Condemned (v. 27).

This means that we should not seek out the evil or faults in others for our satisfaction. We should not sit in censorious judgment upon the actions of others. However, it does not prohibit the just estimation of the character of others by their deeds.

X. The Compensations of Right Living (v. 38).

The one who gives freely of money, loves sincerely, makes the Golden Rule the standard of his life, shows mercy and kindness to others, and refrains from impugning the motives of others will be fully rewarded in kind. God will see to it that there be no loss.

Keeping the Mouth Closed

Fewer Words

The more you say, the less people will remember. The fewer the words, the greater the profit.—Fanelon.

POULTRY

PLAN INSPECTION OF LIVE POULTRY

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Agreements establishing a live poultry inspection service in New York city have been signed by the New York Live Poultry Commission Merchants association, the Greater New York Live Poultry Chamber of Commerce, and the United States Department of Agriculture, it was announced today. The service goes into effect November 15.

The agreement is the outcome of efforts by New York poultry interests to establish better business methods in the industry. The department was asked by the trade to make a survey of conditions in the New York market, with a view to putting into effect an inspection service under government supervision.

The survey, made last August, indicated the practicability of the work to be financed by the trade, and in conjunction with compulsory inspection of all live poultry arriving at New York, under board of health regulations, the department worked out an inspection system which has been approved by the trade.

Inspectors are to be licensed by the Department of Agriculture, the poultry to be inspected for condition, and later for class, grade, and quality. Inspection certificates under the agreement are to be joint certificates of the Department of Agriculture and the two co-operating organizations.

Inspection fees are to be fixed by the secretary of agriculture, and the inspection work conducted in line with the sanitary code of the New York city board of health, as well as with the laws and regulations of the states of New York and New Jersey. The agreement is to run until June 30, 1927, unless terminated at an earlier date by mutual consent. It may be renewed, however, at expiration.

Green Feed Important for Layers in Winter

Green feed is important in the ration of hens in winter. A California bulletin tells of a request from some of their breeders for help in combating a disease which resembles roup in many respects. The station found that it was not roup for it could not be transmitted from one hen to another. Further investigation showed that the flocks were affected with a nutritional disease on account of lack of green feed in the ration.

A good many people supply this green feed by sprouting oats or by having a supply of root crops. Some could improve their ration and overcome a good deal of their trouble by making use of the shattering leaves from clover or alfalfa hay. If the shatterings, which in the majority of cases are mostly leaves, are picked up and given to the hens in the morning they will eat a lot of the leaves and smaller stems. The coarser material will make excellent scratch material in which to feed the grain portion of the ration. These shatterings make a good substitute for other green feed.

Poultry Notes

Sprout oats for the poultry flock.

• • •

The big, fat, yellow-legged hens seem to be doing anything but laying eggs.

• • •

The average egg production, the country over, is said to be 130 per hen per year.

• • •

Cod livsr will help keep the poultry flock in good health and keep the eggs coming this winter.

• • •

Many eggs will stand 20 pounds pressure on the shell. The average is about fourteen or fifteen pounds.

• • •

The production of winter eggs requires care and feed which make the conditions as nearly like spring as possible. The person who feeds his hens nothing but corn, oats and wheat will be disappointed.

• • •

Hatching eggs should be not only fertile but also standard weight, clear, sound, fresh and uniform in shape and color.

Growing chickens, like all other young and growing animals, need large amounts of high-protein feed for muscle and bone building.

• • •

Breeding hens should be kept out in the sunshine as much as possible. Every time the sun shines they should be driven out, if they don't go on their own accord.

• • •

One thing for the poultryman to remember: Old hens need more feed than pullets need to produce a dozen eggs.

• • •

Best results can be obtained if the brooder house is ready, the stove in place and the heat properly regulated before the chicks arrive.

• • •

Winter seems to whet the appetities of chicken thieves, and locks are no good. One man trained a lot of hysterical Leghorns to squall lustily at any sound in the henhouse.

CAP AND BELLS

ALL WORN OUT

Another newly rich man was traveling in search of culture. In a famous art gallery, he was shown a piece of old Greek sculpture, and was told it was 3,000 years old.

"What's it worth?" he asked.

"About $100,000," said his guide.

"Ah!" he grunted. "And have you any idea how much more a new one would be?"

Veracious Fisherman

"What is the defendant's reputation for veracity?" asked the judge.

"Excellent, your honor," said the witness. "I've known him to admit that he had been fishing all day and hadn't got a single bite."

Must Be Cause

"Do you think Dolly wants to get married at last?"

"Yes. She dropped her music lessons and is taking up interior decorating."

Wavering

"Judge, I can't understand why you hesitated to decide this motion in my favor. It's common sense."

"That's the point that scares me off. It's common sense, therefore it can't be law."

It Was Solid

First Girl—So Jack thinks I am statuesque.

Second Girl—Well, he said you made him think of a statue—especially your head.

—8—

A droll idea entered Mansfield's head. He was not without humor. So he returned to his desk, looked into the telephone book, and called a number. A woman's voice answered.

"I wish to speak with Mr. Cathewe."

"Just a moment, please."

Three or four minutes passed.

"Hello! This is Mr. Cathewe. What do you wish to speak to me about?"

"I wish to ask you some questions, frankly. Why do you hate me?"

"I do not hate you. My attitude is absolutely impersonal."

"That's blunt enough. What would you say if I expressed the opinion that you carried out your part of the bargain, and that the hour had arrived for me to carry out mine?"

A long pause.

"Events have made that impossible. I release you."

"You do not hold me, then? Still, I am a good loser. I will introduce you to my daughter."

"Between your daughter and me there is the space of two worlds. I regret that folly on board the ship. Moreover, I am a poor man. Every dollar I have in this world I earn by honest labor."

"I don't quite get that. I have been duly informed that you have on deposit nearly half a million."

Another pause.

"That money does not belong to me, Mr. Mansfield."

That was the end of the conversation.

Mansfield then wrote two letters. The first was local. It was to the chief of police. It demanded as quickly as possible a good photograph of Brandon Cathewe. It did not matter how it was obtained. The second letter was directed to a celebrated detective agency in New York. The best man they had was wanted immediately.

"Dinner is served, sir," announced the butler from the doorway.

"Is Miss Betty down?"

"She begs to be excused, sir."

Mansfield ran upstairs and rapped on the door of his daughter's boudoir.

"It is father, Betty. Are you ill?"

"No, daddy. Just tired and headachy."

"May I come in?"

He heard the key turn in the lock, and he pushed in the door. He saw instantly that she had been crying.

"I . . . I saw that article in the Herald," she sobbed. "It made me wild with fury. After you have done so much for Bannister!"

A warm glow pervaded his heart.

"You mustn't waste any tears on that twaddle, Betty. It's just politics; it's all a part of the game."

"Come along to dinner. I've got a surprise for you. I'm sending for your aunt, your mother's sister. You ought not to be the only woman in this big house. Your aunt is a charming woman. And there is one thing, little lady, I want you always to remember: Your mother's fortune makes you rich in your own right. Do as you please with it. And when the day comes and you find a man of your fancy, marry him. I'll trust you to pick out one worth while."

He laughed, tucked her arm under his, and led her to the stairs.

Around about ten that night you would have found her on the floor before her boudoir fire, reading her letters. She would read so far into a letter, and then a picture would drift in between: blue sky, blue water, the vague scent of clover, and an odd young man bending over flat stones.

She wanted to throw the letters into the fire. It was impossible. She knew that she would have regretted the act throughout her life. But to find some way out of the thraldom!

She put the letters in a Florentine box, which she restored to a drawer. She was about to close this when her eye was attracted by a slip of paper. It was a typewritten list of the bonds and stocks and accumulated funds of which her private fortune consisted. Away down toward the end she came upon something which she had not noticed previously: "Fifty shares the Bannister Morning Herald!"

"The only way you can break an editor," she murmured, "is to buy his sheet and turn him adrift."

Thereupon a great and glorious idea popped into her head.

CHAPTER V

George Cottar.

Mansfield could not read. He tossed his volume upon the table and got up. He lighted a cigar; then he went into the hall for his hat and topcoat. He left the house through the conservatory door.

It was moonlight, and a stroll about the gardens might settle this unusual mental turmoil.

He passed along the aisles of rose bushes. There were still some flowers in bloom. He pushed through the bushes to the next row, where there was a magnificent pink Arends. He cut it with his penknife and drew it through his buttonhole. He threw away his half-consumed cigar. Then he glanced again at Betty's window. It was dark.

In the very center of the gardens was a marble basin, with a faun seated at one end, his pipes emitting thin streams of water. The tinkle of the water sounded pleasantly on Mansfield's ears. Pipe tobacco; and good tobacco, too. One of the gardeners'? No; they all smoked abominable weed.

"Who's there?" he demanded sharply.

The shadow began to move. Mansfield, being in vigorous health and sound of wind, ran along the path. He made a short cut, and arrived at the sidewalk as the other ran across the street diagonally. This maneuver set his face under the full glare of the street lamp.

Mansfield stopped. Cathewe, prowling around in the gardens? The fool, then, was really in love with Betty! He could give up the woman he loved for the sake of an ideal—an ideal which, if pursued unfalteringly, might break her father.

Mansfield returned to the house, his usually cold and precise brain off its balance. The whole affair was so absurd that it resembled a dream rather than a reality. He hung up his hat and coat mechanically, plucked the rose from the buttonhole, and proceeded to his room immersed in reverie.

He had missed something. No; it wasn't romance. He had had his fill of that—in steel. He knew what he had missed. It was the thing that had lured that fellow Cathewe to come prowling into the gardens, merely to stand under Betty's window. Love!

His Editorials Were Full of Punch and Prophecy.

Slowly he rose, picked up the vase in which he had placed the flower, tiptoed into the hall, and set it before Betty's door.

Next morning Betty came into the breakfast room with a joyous rush. She was as pleasing to the eye as a summer cloud; in a filmy white, a pink boudoir cap on her head, and the rose pinned to her bodice.

"Daddy Mansfield, did you put this rose by my door?"

He could not answer her directly. "I thought perhaps you had gone to bed. There won't be many more this year."

She walked over to him and stooped. "You may kiss me for that." He took her head between his palms and kissed both her cheeks, soundly. She ran back to her chair and began to volley French at him. Finally he laughed.

"You're too much for me. My French is motor-truck style."

"Daddy, I want to go back to France."

"But I need you, honey!" he cried. And as the words passed his lips, the miracle lay revealed. That was it, he needed her.

"Why do you need me, daddy?"—in a kind of terrified whisper.

"Because I love you. Because I've only just found it out."

* * * * * * *

Cathewe's newspaper, for all that it was losing money daily, was a success. Its editorial opinions began to be copied far and wide across the land. He thought and wrote clearly upon all subjects. His editorials were full of punch and prophecy.

But he was losing money. He had heard tales about Moloch, and now he understood. Each additional boost to his circulation made a corresponding loss. Without the local advertisements this ascending popularity was becoming more and more costly. And any day his stockholders might sell out. This would not nullify his control, but it might add infinite confusion, internal warfare.

So far he had won two big battles. He had made the health department an efficient organization and he had blocked a deal by the local traction company (Mansfield's) to charge a six-cent fare. And he had made the last election of Mansfield's congressional candidate extremely difficult.

At noon one day in October Cathewe came down for his breakfast, a frown between his eyes.

"What is it, sonny?" asked his mother.

"What is what?"

"The meaning of that frown."

"Oh, well, I had a curious experience at the office last night. I heard an ahem and looked up. Bang! went a flashlight; and before I could recover from my astonishment, the photographer had vanished. Took a picture of me—stole it. But I can't let that worry me. I must get that new book done. Our funds are getting low."

Shortly after, he entered his study and closed the door. She saw no more of him until four, when he signified that he was off for a walk in the hills.

He had not been gone more than twenty minutes when Nancy's smart runabout stopped at the curb. Two or three times a week she carried Mrs. Cathewe off for a ride in the country.

At the same hour today father's chariot of mercy rolled under the Mansfield porte cochere. But more of that anon.

Mrs. Cathewe had to change, so for a few moments Nancy was left to her own devices. She saw the study door wide open and stepped across the threshold. Books were scattered over the floor, the air filled with the strong scent of tobacco, a desk littered with paper, a wicker basket filled to the brim with closely written sheets, a waste basket choked with crumpled discarded efforts.

The one thing that had a touch of orderliness was the stack of blank paper arranged before the empty chair. She could see that something had been written on the top sheet, as she bent to see what it was. A name repeated many times.

"George Cottar," "George Cottar," repeated perhaps a dozen times.

"George Cottar!" She spoke the name aloud. A pile of manuscript and the name George Cottar! The illumination left her temporarily blinded. The Brushwood Boy—George Cottar—Brandon Cathewe! Why, Brand was the novelist; and hiding his light under the bushel like this. What did that signify?

Impulsively she reached down into the waste basket and picked up one of the crumpled sheets, and smoothed it out. A rejected sheet; he would never miss it. So she folded it and put it in a pocket. Then she stole forth, her eyes shining and her cheeks aflame.

* * * * * * *

Mansfield had an odd experience—for him—that afternoon. A representative of the local merchants called to ask him to release them from their promise regarding the boycott of the Herald.

"We are sorry, Mr. Mansfield," he announced, "but we can't carry this on any longer. We don't want to offend you or lose the trade of the thousands you employ, but we have come to the conclusion that it would be far more profitable for us to cater to the other seventy-odd thousand and let your people go. What answer shall I carry back?"

"That they are under no further obligations," answered Mansfield quietly.

"Our thanks, Mr. Mansfield. We shall renew our contracts with the Herald at once."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Tribute Seems Rough on Wedding Finery

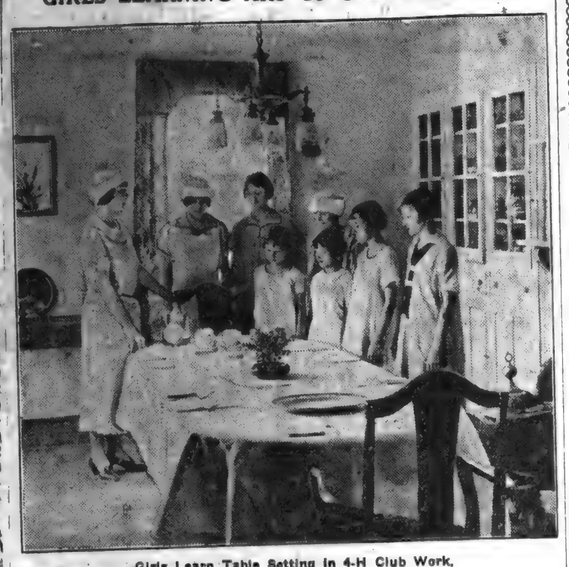
Rice and confetti, for use after wedding ceremonies, both have their opponents, but they seem preferable to the coal dust which, we are told, was thrown at St. Pancras recently after the wedding of a coal heaver and his bride.

But the idea of this occupational tribute is not quite new; some years ago a confectioner and his bride were pelted with the little sweets which are known as "hundreds and thousands." The idea might be endlessly extended—tea leaves for the grocer, sawdust for the joiner, chopped suet for the butcher, buns for the baker, buttons for the draper, orange peel for the greengrocer, and pills for the doctor and chemist. In the case of writing people and journalists, presumably all their friends would turn up and empty their fountain pens at the bride and bridegroom. That sounds a curious compliment—but then, so does coal dust.—Manchester (England) Guardian Weekly.

Early Use of Gas

The first American house in which gas was used for lighting was the home of David Melville, at Newport, R. I. Baltimore, Md., was the first city in the United States to use gas for lighting. It was introduced there in 1817.

GIRLS LEARNING ART OF TABLE SETTING



Girls Learn Table Setting in 4-H Club Work.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Among the many activities of 4-H club girls meal planning and food preparation are always popular, because the knowledge gained can be directly applied in their own homes. Young girls usually like to know how to cook certain things, like baking biscuits or cake, or helping their mothers with the canning. Frequently they become skilled in preparing one or two special foods, but the art of getting all the parts of a meal together at the same time is one that must be learned, and, in many cases, so is the sister art of serving a meal that it is dainty and attractive. There is all the difference in the world between just putting food on the table, and serving it in the correct way, which is also the simplest, easiest, most graceful way, calculated to give a feeling of pleasant restfulness to those who eat it.

Plan Suitable Balance.

In club work, therefore, it has been found advisable to show these girls not only how to cook each part of a meal properly, but how to plan it so that there will be a suitable balance in the diet and also so that the various dishes will be done at the hour set for the meal.

Table setting is part of the instruction in meal planning. The girls in the photograph, which was taken in Albemarle county, Virginia, by the United States Department of Agriculture, are being shown the right way to set the table. The club agent appears to be calling attention to some detail of the coffee service. It is obvious that she has demonstrated the use of a low flower centerpiece, placed on a round embroidered white linen doily. Perhaps she has shown how much better it is to place platters and serving dishes squarely at right angles to the main lines of the table, instead of diagonally or in a nondescript position as one often sees them. The individual "covers" or places can scarcely be distinguished in the photograph, but close scrutiny shows the fork on the left with the folded napkin, the knife and spoon on the right, with the water glass. If individual salts and peppers are used, they, too, will be put beside the glasses, while the bread and butter plates, with butter spreaders, will go on the left above the napkins.

No doubt the demonstration will conclude with a warning not to forget serving spoons for each vegetable dish, carving knife and fork for the meat, and some instruction about graceful unobtrusive crumbing and clearing away.

Lesson in Simplicity.

The room in which this demonstration is being given is in itself a lesson in charming simplicity of furnishing, curtaining and arrangement. Club girls, who live on farms, far away from neighbors, do not have as many opportunities as city girls to go into other people's homes and get ideas on how to make their own surroundings more attractive. Club work performs a special kind of service when it thus broadens the outlook of the members and gives them a chance to compare their own homes with others.

GROUP OF GOOD SALAD DRESSINGS

Recipes to Suit Many Different Tastes.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

People differ very widely in the kind of salad dressings they like. Some want their dressings boiled and some want to make them at the table; many people do not like the taste of oil, while others put mayonnaise on all sorts of combinations from fruit mixtures to cold meat sandwiches. Here are some good dressings to suit several of these tastes, all supplied by the United States Department of Agriculture.

For French, or oil and vinegar dressing, use these proportions and make any amount you need: ½ teaspoonful of salt, a few grains of cayenne, paprika if desired, 2 tablespoonfuls of vinegar, 6 tablespoonfuls of oil. An old cook book used to say that French dressing required "a spendthrift for oil, a miser for vinegar, and a madman to stir it up." At any rate, add vinegar sparingly and beat the ingredients together until they are well blended. If you have a cruet or other bottle with a tight stopper, you can keep French dressing on hand all the time, simply shaking the bottle vigorously when ready to use the dressing.

There is little difficulty in making a good mayonnaise that does not separate if the ingredients and bowl are cold and the oil is added very slowly at first, only a few drops at a time. Begin by measuring out the oil and vinegar in cupfuls or better still small pitchers from which you can pour them easily and carefully. You will need 1 cupful of oil and 2 tablespoonfuls of vinegar, or lemon juice, or both mixed together. Put an egg yolk in a cold bowl and beat it with a dover or rotary egg beater until it is slightly thick. Add 1 tablespoonful of sugar, ½ teaspoonful of mustard, a few grains of cayenne, and 1 teaspoonful of salt. Some people add the salt last, believing that this prevents curdling or separating. Mix these dry ingredients well and start adding the oil drop by drop, beating it in, then adding increasingly larger amounts, but always with care not to add too much at a time. When the mixture is quite stiff and thick, and about a third of the oil has been added, thin with a little of the vinegar and lemon, but do not add much at a time. Continue adding oil and vinegar alternately until all of each has been used. A single egg yolk can be used as a starter for double these amounts of oil and acid, but the seasonings must be increased proportionately. Keep the dressing in a covered jar in a cold place but do not allow it to freeze. If the dressing should separate while you are making it, you can start with another egg yolk in a fresh bowl and add the unsuccessful dressing little by little as at first until it is all worked in. Fresh oil and vinegar can then be added to make a large amount of dressing. Mayonnaise soon liquifies when put on meat, fruit or vegetables, so it should not be added to the salad until serving time.

If you have on hand some sour cream, you may prefer to make a cooked dressing. A good method is as follows: Beat an egg very light, and add to it ¼ teaspoonful of mustard, ½ teaspoonful of salt, ¼ teaspoonful of paprika pepper, ½ tablespoonful of sugar, ¼ cupful of vinegar, and one cupful of sour cream. Mix well and cook in a double boiler, stirring constantly, until thick and smooth. If this dressing has any tendency to separate, strain it before cooling.

The Sight of a Crisp Salad Will Manufacture Appetite.

Honey Instead of Sugar

Honey may be used in place of sugar, cup for cup in many cake and cookie recipes. In addition to its sweetening qualities, honey is about one-fourth water, and the amount of liquid called for in the original recipe should be reduced accordingly when honey is substituted for sugar. Many honey recipes have been tested by the United States Department of Agriculture and a bulletin containing them will be sent on request to the department in Washington.

Know Your Sweetheart by His Handwriting

Has He a Good Memory?

If the writer dots the "i's" exactly and makes all of his t-bars without forgetting any you may be sure that he has a good memory, particularly if the writing is even and neat in form. This indication of writing is perhaps the most definite key to a good memory. Absence of loops and an abundance of blunt strokes of medium pressure are additional indications of good memory.

When writing looks dirty or carelessly written the fact is plain that there is a poor faculty of organization on the part of the writer and a natural inclination to be slipshod.

Angular writing, an absence of well-rounded letters, is almost invariably indication of a keen memory on the part of the writer.

When "d's" and "t's" are made without loop in upright then you will find the writer's mind concerned with facts and readily able to catalogue them. Sensitive people who make the loops in "d's" remember a lot of things about the subject that confuse and irritate them but their memory in general is not good.

Even margins and lines on the level also show good memory.

Is He Critical?

A critical nature can get the owner into trouble quickly if destructively used. Many who criticize with the intention to help are often misunderstood. These people are found to write t-bars with a sharp point to the right and instead of making sharp pointed loops to the looped letters these loops are well rounded. The habitual critic, always looking for the fault in whatever he looks at, is constantly making lower "f's", "g's" and "y's" with a wasplike point. Such formation of letters shows an inclination to sting with the tongue. Sarcasm is connected with the critical trait in such writer.

The general appearance of the script is clear cut. Many angles are to be found in this style of writing.

Well-rounded letters are made by the easy-going person who has no desire to reform anyone or perfect anything. The person who is not critical is always known as the good-natured fellow, but he seldom accomplishes any lasting work that lives after him.

Flying t-bars indicate the writer that will go to extremes in his criticism.

Is He Conservative?

The writing will be flowing in appearance, many times it is nevertheless full of points and is angular most of the time.

Many times the words will be connected. Often all of the initials in the signature will be connected. Y loops will be missing and instead the stroke will be brought up on the right of the down stroke. Script will be neither heavy or light.

All letters written by the conservative type will be closed. These people do not talk much.

Note.—Do not make final judgment until other signs in writing are studied.

Mistletoe

The European mistletoe grows on many kinds of trees, particularly the apple and its close relatives, the service and hawthorn; sometimes, also, on sycamores, limes, poplars, locust trees and firs, but rarely on oaks (contrary to the common belief). In the United States the mistletoe occurs upon various species of hardwood trees from New Jersey to Missouri and southward.

Health in Light's Rays

Electric light is considered by medical authorities a good, healthful substitute for sunlight. In an experiment it restored a collection of eggs in a month. Fowls run to normal vigor. Lamps were installed in the cages.

THE GAME OF A TRAITRESS

By SCOTT NEWBURY

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

BASEL is a little green oasis amid the awful deserts of the war. The little, neat Swiss town was always overflowing with those engaged in reconstructing what they can out of the chaos of suffering and desolation. It was packed with Red Cross nurses and ambulances, and parties of French and German soldiers who were to be exchanged.

My officer friend and I enjoyed the sunlight together every morning, but he spent his afternoons lying down upstairs in his bedroom, shielded from the light by the green shutters. He was still far from strong. Hence he was not present late that afternoon when the Red Cross nurse made her confession to me.

We had noticed each other from the beginning, I believe. There was something striking and arresting in her appearance. She was a Russian, I discovered afterward, and, like all Russians who are not peasants, was of noble affiliations. I had performed some trifling service for her, and somehow she came to tell me this—you know how often we make confessions to comparative strangers.

"I am a spy, the daughter of a spy. I say 'am,' although I have not plied my trade for a long time, because once a spy always a spy. My father was a general in the army; he sold his country's secrets. Not for himself, but for the benefit of the Nihilistic fraternity, to which he belonged. That was his sense of patriotism—perverted but not wholly base.

"He was discovered, as in the end he was bound to be, and put to death. He left me penniless. I was then a girl of nineteen. I spied too— for a living. It had been suggested to me that, with my advantages, I was capable of extracting secrets from Russian army officers, always suspicious. The proposal came from the foreign country which my father had secretly served. I accepted it, and it put me in possession of a comfortable income.

"For years I went up and down through Russia, gathering information, until I had covered the land with a network of intrigue. I had agents under me; I was trusted absolutely by the foreign country I served. And then the war broke out, and all this devil's sowing came to the ripening.

"Colonel Repovitch was in charge of the arsenal at Krujevatz. The arsenal contained models of the new 25-centimeter gun which was to be used by the Serbian and Russian forces. If I could procure a model of this gun, or even the 'key' to the breech mechanism, I was to receive a hundred thousand rubles.

"It was sport to me, this jesting with men's lives and nations' safety; and if I thought about it seriously at all I only thought of my father, shot by the Russian government, and of my duty to avenge him. The Russian government had not the least suspicion of my activities.

"I went to the garrison town of Krujevatz, and there, posing as a Russian countess, engaged in hospital work. I had no difficulty in scraping acquaintance with Colonel Repovitch, whom it was my mission to fascinate. We became friends. Before I had wormed out of him the secret—and he trusted me implicitly and believed me to be a countrywoman of his—I realized that I loved him, as he loved me. I had never loved before. I had been too hard, too selfish and too much engrossed in my sordid occupation.

"I spent a terrible hour when I found myself face to face with my destiny. At last, summoning all my pride to my assistance, I won. I thought of my martyred father and —and of the hundred thousand rubles then waiting for me in the pocket of the military spy, Count N——.

"I knew where Colonel Repovitch kept his keys. I took them, opened his safe, and extracted the model of the gun. Colonel Repovitch was on duty for a week in a distant town. When he came back the model reposed safely in his safe again, and the hundred thousand rubles were in my own pocket.

"The news soon leaked out. Colonel Repovitch was placed on trial. Even then nobody suspected me, except the colonel. He knew—and he would not betray me. Instead, he simply sent me a message by a trusted orderly, to leave the country.

"I went to Vienna, where I learned he had been condemned to death as a spy and was to be shot as soon as the czar confirmed the sentence. Why did I place my head within the lion's jaws again?

"I went back to Serbia because I loved him, and I felt that this treachery, which had taken a man's life away, had awakened something that had slumbered within me against my knowledge. I went back to confess—but first I must see Colonel Repovitch.

I reached Krujevatz—you know how these journeys can be arranged even in time of war. The colonel had not been put to death, but the czar's order was expected hourly. By means of my influence—for he had not denounced me—I managed to secure an interview with him in his cell.

"When he saw me his face seemed to light up. In that hour of imminent death the husk of the man had fallen away, revealing only the goodness of the spirit. He took my hands in his and bade me sit down.

"'Tell me how you came to do it,' he said, as if he had been a father speaking to a child.

"I burst into tears. Something hard in me melted also, and I confessed everything. I told him of my father's occupation and his death; how I had come to take up the work of espionage; there was nothing that I did not reveal. When I had ended speaking he said, gently:

"'At least my death will not have been in vain if I have saved Russia the services of one of her enemies' most trusted agents.'

"Then he spoke solemnly, because the time was very short and the warden was growing impatient.

"'I told you that I loved you, Vera,' he said. 'I had no suspicion of your occupation. When I discovered that you had forced the safe I felt that death would have been preferable to the knowledge of the dishonor of the one woman whom I had loved and believed in. You took away my faith. Can you give it back to me?'

"'Yes, I would if it were possible,' I answered, weeping.

"'It is possible, Vera,' he answered.

"'How?' I asked.

"'By telling me that you did love me and were not playing a part,' said Colonel Repovitch.

"I fell upon my knees and told him that I had been sincere. I had loved him indeed, and it had been the love of a good man and the knowledge of my hideous perfidy that had awakened my soul. He listened till I had done.

"'I prayed for that,' he said. 'Now I can die happily, Vera. And you will—?'

"'I shall devote the rest of my life to trying to atone for my past life,' I answered.

"He kissed me, and then, as the guard was growing very impatient, I departed. I never saw him again. The enemy entered the town on the second day, and I have no doubt that he had already been shot in the citadel."

It would be impossible to exaggerate the horror on the face of the Red Cross nurse as she finished speaking. Then I took up the tale.

"You cannot be sure that he died," I answered. "Suppose, for instance, that the order of the czar had not arrived before the storming of Krujevatz, and that he escaped."

"He would give himself up," she answered with conviction.

"Well, then," I resumed, "let us suppose that the order had not arrived. Imagine that the prison was thrown open in the face of the enemy, and that he took a rifle and fought like a common soldier, distinguishing himself so greatly that afterward the case was reopened. Suppose—just for a possibility, which can do no harm—that the truth came out. Suppose he was pardoned and restored to his rank in the army."

She looked at me with wide eyes. "What do you mean? What do you know?" she cried.

"Suppose," I continued, "that he fought through the rest of that campaign until he received a crippling wound, which was the cause of his retirement, on half-pay, and that he left the service full of honors and warmly appreciated by his royal master."

She grasped me by the hand. "You have heard something; you are concealing something. Do not keep me in suspense!" she cried. "If you know anything of Colonel Repovitch, if indeed he does not lie beneath the sod in the arsenal of Krujevatz, tell me, for pity's sake!"

At that moment my officer friend, having finished his siesta, came down the steps of the hotel, looking for me. When he was a hundred paces away, halting on his cane, and stretching himself in the warm sunshine, I called to him.

"Repovitch!" I cried. "Come here! Here is a lady who wants to make your acquaintance."

The Red Cross nurse stood still as if turned to ice.

"Where is the lady who wants to meet an old cripple?" asked Repovitch, hobbling gayly toward us.

I took the nurse by the hand and led her toward him. I could feel the blood throbbing fiercely in her veins.

"Here," I answered. Thus I left them.

Machines Employed in Composition of Knots

Successful machines for tying knots in cords, threads and the like have been introduced in considerable number. Knotting and tying devices for self-binder harvesting machines were brought into extensive and successful use a good many years ago. Machines for tying a species of knot in the manufacture of fish nets have long been used. The girls in the cotton mills who tend spoolers and other kinds of machines which operate upon yarns and threads wear upon one wrist, like a wrist watch, a little machine called a hand-knotter, which they use in tying together, "piecing," as it is called, the ends of yarns or threads which break in being operated upon. There is a rather large machine employed in the weaving industry, called a tying-in machine, which automatically selects a pair of individual threads from two sheets of warp-threads, ties them together, selects and ties together another pair, and so on until the thousand or more threads composing one warp which has been woven up nearly to the end thereof in a loom have been united singly to those of a second warp, preparatory to proceeding with the weaving operations with the second warp.

DAIRY FACTS

DAIRY HINTS FOR SEVERE WEATHER

The dairy cow is a home market for feeds produced and if she is to pay the highest prices by producing milk, she must be kept comfortable in winter. That's just the way it is and the owner who doesn't keep his milk cow warm and dry will find that she will not produce milk at a profit.

"The cow that is not kept warm by a good barn and a dry bed will use a large part of her feed for this purpose and thus reduce the amount of nutriments available for milk production," says John A. Arey, dairy extension specialist at the North Carolina State college. "Then, too, grain must be fed liberally on those farms where it will be necessary to use low grade roughage for legume hays."

Mr. Arey recommends that fresh, clean water of a medium temperature be given the cows during winter. Cold water chills their bodies and feed energy must then be used to warm them. The water supply must also be convenient for the cows to use. Cows forced to go long ways through mud and rain for water do not drink enough for heaviest milk production.

It is advised that an accurate feed and milk production record be kept on the cows during winter because some cows pay well for the feed consumed, while others do not. Accurate records are needed to locate the unprofitable cows. Mr. Arey states that the new year might be started in the right manner by the dairyman buying a pair of milk scales.

Another winter suggestion by Mr. Arey is to give the young heifer calves some extra feed and care during the cold months of December, January and February. A stunted heifer never makes a good cow, he states, and many dairy cows are under-sized because they were not properly fed when calves.

Big Production Records Possible on Small Farms

Expensive equipment and high-priced herdsmen are not always necessary for making advanced registry records with cows, according to the dairy department of the New Jersey College of Agriculture. Good cows are the first requirement for good records, and many a man does not realize how good his cows are until he gives them a chance.

Fame and fortune have come to many a small breeder because he started official testing of his herd with what equipment and means he had instead of waiting until he had everything just right. It isn't necessary to break any records to make official testing a very profitable venture. Good ordinary records make additional values that pay big dividends on the money and labor involved.

The department further points out that the small breeder has some distinct advantages in his favor. He lives closer to his cows. He knows them better and they know him. He can always rig up some place to make his test cows comfortable, and by his personal care and attention overcome many of the advantages the big breeder may have in the way of elaborate equipment and expensive herdsmen.

If the small breeder brings out a sensational producer, the credit, fame and fortune are all his and he doesn't have to divide it with anyone, except to give his wife due credit for her encouragement.

Selecting Herd Bull Is Serious Dairy Problem

Every breeder of dairy cattle should study seriously the problem of herd improvement as the whole future of the herd is at stake when the bull is selected, says R. E. Waters, extension dairy specialist, Clemson college.

The problem of getting a better herd is largely one of having better young stock coming on. This is a matter of breeding and particularly of selecting the right bull.

The ability to produce milk is inherited through both the sire and dam, but since the sire is responsible for half the inheritance of each animal born in the herd, he is clearly the most important single factor in the development of the dairy herd.

To obtain the greatest possible improvement by use of the bull it is very important that due consideration be given to his pedigree, for both type and production. And where possible, select a bull that has some daughters, preferably some that have been in milk and proven their ability as producers. With the above points in mind a breeder can select a bull that will, with reasonable certainty, transmit to his offspring the desired type and production.

Balanced Ration Helps

A slight change in the ration of eight dairy cows reported recently made a difference of more than $46 a month in net profits from them. The change consisted in adding a portion of a high protein concentrate to the ration, which brought immediate results in the increased yield of milk. No matter how good a cow may be if she does not receive a good balanced ration suitable for her needs she cannot give a profitable yield of milk and butterfat.

BLACK VELVET FOR FORMAL WEAR, SHORTER COATS ARE COMING IN

BLACK velvet and pearls! A sumptuous combination this and one which is outstanding in the pageantry of midwinter evening frocks. It is not enough to refer to the beautiful pearl-worked black velvet dress, which is the "last word" from Paris, as merely a beaded gown. There is little in common with these exquisite hand-embroidered creations and the "popular" glittering machine-beaded georgette types. The be-pearled black velvet gown stands in a class all its own.

If you would get an idea of the pearl-beaded and silver-embroidered black velvet robe as a master artist creates it, study this picture. Regally beautiful, is it not? This exclusive model presents a new and fascinating interpretation of the black and white effects which fashion considers very smart.

Decorated With Pearl Beads.

The alliance of pearls and velvet is not at all times expressed through actually patterning the fabric with the beads. To achieve the now-so-modish black and white compose, women are wearing snow-white accessories with their decollette and sleeveless black velvet dresses. These include ropes of pearls wound around the throat and falling in festoons until they seem almost like a trimming for the bodice. The inevitable shoulder flower is either a gardenia, a shaggy chrysathemum or a white rose. Even the young girls are wearing black velvet frocks of youthful silhouette with a single white flower posed at the left shoulder or low round neckline.

Another partnership of pearls and black velvet is registered in the realm of millinery. The latest French imports include cunning black velvet chapeaux encrusted with white pearls most elaborately designed.

Velvet, how often we repeat that word this season. It is not at all surprising that the evening coat worn over this handsome pearl-patterned velvet dress in the picture, is also of velvet—brilliant sapphire blue, if you please. This marvelously befurred wrap is heavily enbroidered in metal thread across the shoulders. The colorful velvet evening wrap plays a stellar role among midwinter formal modes.

Not always does "cut it short" pertain to interviews; in the parlance of the stylist it refers to the latest-mode winter coat. Recent advice from fashion's headquarters is to the effect that shorter coats are "coming in."

Now that plaited and plaided skirts are so fashionable, one welcomes the short-coat vogue, for together they produce a chic and youthful silhouette. A very interesting short-coat model is shown in the picture.

Perhaps you are questioning in your own mind as to the material employed for the development of this charming coat. Velvet, of course, is the answer, for velvet is one of the smartest of midwinter cloakings.

This pretty coat in the picture might just as well have been made of black velvet with a rich dark fur trimming, but the creator of this girlish wrap decided on a beautiful vibrant blue with chinchilla collar, cuffs and borderings, for colorful velvet is very popular for daytime coats as well as evening ones.

The fact that the sleeves are so fancifully furred, emphasizes this season's fashion trend toward cuffs of extreme novelty. The bordering of this coat is also somewhat unique. Note how it separates toward the front just enough to allow a row of cunning buttons between.

Now that colorful velvet coats have come into fashion, the vogue promises some extremely interesting versions. Very choice is the black velvet coatee collared with unspotted ermine. Straight from Paris comes a black velvet tailored jacket bound with braid, worn over a black rep skirt. The tight-fitting sleeve is slightly belled at the wrist.

An attractive Paris-made ensemble shows a dark green velvet jacket designed with a mannish waistcoat, just above which one catches a glimpse of a Nile-green crepe blouse. The skirt is a plaited plaid one with green the dominant color. It is assuring for the future to know that in advance Southern resort and Riviera apparel many velvet coatees are included.

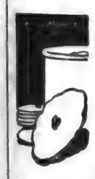
A CHAPTER ON COOKIES

This is the time of the year more than any other when we look to see that the cookey jar is well replenished.



Ice Box Cookies.—Take one cupful each of white and brown sugar, two cupfuls of butter, three eggs, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder and one and one-half cupfuls of flour, one cupful of almonds blanched and halved. Mix at night and form into two long rolls and let stand in the ice chest. Slice very thin with a sharp knife and bake five minutes in a moderate oven. Place half an almond on each before baking. This makes twelve dozen cookies.

White Cookies.—Take one cupful of sugar, one cupful of butter, cream well and add two beaten eggs, one-half cupful of milk, nutmeg to flavor and three teaspoonfuls of baking powder well mixed with the flour to roll. Chill and roll very thin, cut with a large cutter, sprinkle with sugar and bake in a hot oven.

Molasses Drop Cookies.—Take one-half cupful each of butter, sugar, molasses, and sour milk, one egg, one teaspoonful of soda, cinnamon, ginger, nutmeg and cloves to taste. Add two cupfuls of flour, one-half cupful of raisins. Let stand until the next day in a cold place then drop and bake.

Jumbles.—Take one cupful of molasses and one-fourth teaspoonful of soda, beat well to mix, add three eggs, one cupful each of brown sugar and shortening, one-half tablespoonful each of ginger and cinnamon, four cupfuls of flour, scant. Drop with a teaspoon on baking sheets.

Almond Macaroons.—Take one cupful each of coconut, corn flakes and sugar. Beat two egg whites until stiff, add the sugar, a little salt and vanilla to flavor, then stir in carefully the coconut and flakes. Drop with a teaspoon on baking sheet. Bake in a moderately hot oven. Makes two dozen.

Ginger Cookies.—This is the time of the year when the cooky jar should be full to the top. Take one cupful each of molasses, lard and sugar, one egg, one cupful of sour cream, a quarter of a teaspoonful of soda (in the cream), one teaspoonful each of cinnamon, ginger and soda, mix all together and add flour to roll. Some of these cookies may be iced with powdered sugar mixed with a little butter and cold coffee to make of the consistency to spread. Sprinkle with nuts and they will be most festive in appearance.

Good Things to Eat.

For a pie that is dainty and somewhat out of the ordinary try:

Pineapple Pie.—Take one cupful of powdered sugar, one-half cupful of butter, two eggs, one cupful of shredded pineapple. Mix the sugar and butter to a cream, add the beaten yolks of the eggs and the pineapple, a pinch of salt, then the stiffly beaten whites are folded in. Bake until firm and serve with whipped cream.

White Cake.—Take one and one-half cupfuls of sugar, one-half cupful of butter, one cupful of milk, the whites of four eggs and two cupfuls of flour, with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Cream the butter and sugar and the flour alternately with the milk, using one and three-fourths cupfuls; to the one-fourth left add the baking powder and sift it well, add last, then beat well to thoroughly mix the baking powder through the cake mixture. Now fold in lightly the egg whites beaten stiff and bake in layers or loaf.

Good Salad Dressing.—To one teaspoonful of salt add one-half teaspoonful of mustard and one teaspoonful of flour. Melt two and one-half tablespoonfuls of butter and add the dry ingredients; when bubbling add three-fourths of a cupful of milk and cook until smooth, then add one-fourth of a cupful of vinegar which has been beaten with the yolks of four eggs or two whole eggs. Cook over hot water until the egg is cooked, stirring constantly. Lemon juice may be used instead of vinegar if preferred, especially when using fruit.

Army Enlistments

During the fiscal year ended July 1, 56,388 men enlisted in the regular army for three years' service, according to the annual report of the adjutant general, just submitted. That total included 15,785 men who had just completed one enlistment or more; 7,606 men who had had previous service, and 32,990 who were original enlistments. In all branches of the army the average of re-enlistments was 64.5 per cent.—Washington News.

Funchal One Spot Untouched by War

Funchal, on the island of Madeira, historically is one of the most peaceful spots in the world. It has had uninterrupted peace since its discovery by Zarco in 1418. Three times it has been captured by British fleets, but each time returned to Portugal on conclusion of peace. Men have been free to plant and decorate and build there, unscourged by wars, according to Warren H. Miller's "All Around the Mediterranean." They brought grapes from Crete in 1420 and sugar cane from Sicily in 1452, and have been most industrious with them ever since. The result has been many miles of terraces for vines and great plantations inland for sugar cane. Many generations have devoted their efforts to beautifying these lands without molestation. Continued freedom from wars in Funchal has given the people so much time for work that even the pebbled streets are laid in patterns interlined with geometric designs in white stones.

Old-Time Sports in Rural Bavaria

Bavaria is the most old-fashioned part of Germany, and one may see in some remote villages customs that have survived for hundreds of years.

Recently a new Catholic priest was ordained in the little village of Rosshaupten. As usual, the religious part of the ceremony was followed by all kinds of worldly festivity, including the climbing of the "maypole."

The highest tree in the local wood was felled for the purpose.

The branches were lopped off, the bark was peeled and a green wreath of pine branches was hung around the topmost sprig.

It is no easy matter to shin up such a tree, over a yard in circumference near the foot. Indeed, it is so dangerous an undertaking that married men were forbidden to make the attempt.

The housewife smiles with satisfaction as she looks at the basket of clear, white clothes and thanks Russ Bleaching Blue. At all grocers.—Adv.

Strong Combination

What threatens to be a new rival of halitosis may be the cooked, or raw, result of a recent scientific accomplishment reported by Prof. Lucien Daniel, eminent French botanist. He has announced that he has succeeded in grafting a garlic plant and a cabbage plant. Whether the new botanical product will retain the odorous qualities of both its ancestors has not been established, the Independent says.

Lions Stalk on Highways

In East Africa the drought has been so severe that wild animals have invaded the towns and settlements in search of water. At Nairobi the inhabitants have only to stroll a short distance out of town to encounter herds of buffalo and rhinos and it is a frequent occurrence to meet all manner of big game including lions on the roads leading from one town to another.

Looking Back For 50 Years

Fifty years ago this year a national banking system was started in the United States.

Today Americans have on deposit and subject to check or drawing interest the unheardof sum of $60,000,000,000

If you do not own a part of that vast sum, you can still profit through the experience of others. You can still make your dollars wor for you—and a working dollar is the only dollar worth having.

Or you can do your boy or girl a wonderful favor by taking even one dollar and starting an account for them—and then teaching them how thrift and saving has made thee United States the most prosperous, the most contented, the happiest nation in the world.

DEDICATION SERVICES FOR NEW BUILDING

Dedication exercises for the new school building will be held on Thursday afternoon and evening with a lunch for all under the auspices of the Parent Teacher Association at six o'clock.

Ceremonies will be opened by an exercise by the pupils of the Primary room. The third and fourth grade pupils will appear in a Folk Dance and the Intermediate room has consented to demonstrate a few calisthenics.

The notorious East end five will then engage the equally illustrious West end followed by the "Paralytics" vs the "Rheumatics.". How many doctors will be needed to administer to casualties in the latter contest, we hate to predict. We hope each side will be supplied with plenty of substitutes.

Supper will then be served for all in the Domestic Science Room of the old building. The Parent Teacher Association are looking after this part of the program.

At 7:30 the people will again assemble in the gymnasium for the program proper. At this date, the details of this program cannot be announced but the people of the St. Joe community may rest assured that one of the best speakers who can be found will be brought in to give the principal address.

It is hoped that everyone in the township will spend the afternoon and evening at the school to help celebrate the occupation of the new building.

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH ISSUES WARNING

Enclosed find copy of a statewide Quarantine Order adopted by the State Board of Health and which is made effective beginning January 10. Attention is called to Sections 4, 5 and 6 of the Hydrophobia Law, which you will find in your Red Book at page 84. It is the duty of all police officers to kill all dogs found running at large and unmuzzled anywhere in the state, after this Quarantine Order becomes effective. You will note, however, that this does not apply to dogs that are in leash and should not apply, of course, to dogs that are under the control of the owner. An effort should be made also to protect dogs that have been immunized by vaccination, but since there is no way by which a police officer can identify a vaccinated dog, unless he knows the dog, your people should be informed that vaccinated dogs, if permitted to run at large, must be at the risk of the owner.

Wm. F. KING, M. D.
State Health Com.

Copies of this Order are being sent to all health officers, all judges,, all county auditors and all district prosecutors, as requireed by law.

Both the local health officer, E. R. Kinsey, and own marshal, Dewey Smith, have received the above orders and have ordered publication of this notice so that dog owners here may be aware of the quarantine. Please observe this notice. 2t1.

New Clothes for Old Ones

If the old house isn't just right, why not bring it up to present-day standards by a little of the right kind of remodeling and repair?

Perhaps you will need to put in a permanent concrete foundation and basement floor and renew porches and steps with concrete in the spring.

Another big improvement, the most effective modernizing touch, will be an overcoat of Universal cement stucco, applied right over the old walls, whatever they are. You'll worry less about fire, repairs and painting, and besides the winters will be more mild to the folks living inside.

Just ask for suggestions and get a free copy of our booklet, "Recommended Practice for Portland Cement Stucco."

MERRITT HULL WRITES OF TRIP SOUTH

Safety Harbor, Fla.
Jan. 5, 1927

Dear Parents:

Just a few lines to let you we are both well and hope this finds you all the same. This is a lovely day, just 68 degrees and a nice breeze blowing. We had some fun yesterday, went out in Tampa Bay and gathered oysters. Have been living on oysters for a couple of days. When the tide is out, can take a boat and get them in about two feet of water. They sure are fine. Takes about one burlap sack full to make a gallon.

We like it here only are waiting to hear from you then we are going on south. Like our camping outfit fine. Took some Kodak views along route will send some home when we get them finished.

We haven't visited around much yet, just resting up. The cities are about all alike. Can see enough enroute only we will go to Clear Water, St. Petersburg and Sarasota, enroute to Ft. Myers, then across to Miami. Want to go south along west coast as far as we can.

They say the east coast is more tropical and scenery better. They sell us grape fruit 6 for 10 cents, right off the tree, but to get a case and express home would be more expensive than you could buy there. The express is around $3 anr they sell for $2.50 per crate of 24. These we buy I think are a little smaller. They have one tree with four different kinds of fruit grafted on, lemon, orange, grape fruit and tangerine.

The fishing is not much good, was out twice. It costs non-residents nothing to fish in salt water. Each county has a separate law ranging from $2 to $5.25 for fresh water fishing. Non-resident hunting is all the way from $5.25 to $25.00. Haven't hunted any yet, don't think I will.

Will close now and write more the next stopping place.

BRITTIAN FREEBURN DIES IN CALIFORNIA

Brittian B. Freeburn, born April 22, 1889, near Butler, Indiana. Spent the early part of his life in this neighborhood on a farm east of St. Joe. In the year of 1908 he decided he wanted to see the west and in his travels was in several places. Finally settleing in California, when he engaged in sheep ranching. A letter from his Superintendent paid him a fine tribute, saying they will surely miss him as he was trusty and conscientious in his position as Ranch Foreman.

He departed this life at Modesto, California, December 28, 1926, at the age of 37 years, 8 months and 6 days. He leaves to mourn his deeparture, father, mother, four brothers and thre sisters. One sister, Jessie Coburn, preceded him in death in the year of 1920.

The funeral was held from the home of Mr. and Mrs. Glen Freeburn, Friday afternoon. Rev. J. F. McKnight officiating:. E. R. Kinsey funeral director. Burial was made in Riverside Cemetery.

Those who attendeed the funeral from a distancee, were:

JACKSON TOWNSHIP FARMER CALLED TO ARKANSAS

J. C. Freeman of Jackson township is on his way to Mena, Arkansas, to appear in the federal court against Charlie Bates of that place. Some weeks ago Mr. Freeman answered an advertisement in the Hunter-Trader-Trapper magasine for coonhounds. He sent money order for the kind he wanted and after waiting a reasonable time for dog to arrive, he wrote the advertiser and no response was made to his letters. The order was cashed by the postoffice in due time.

Mr. Freeman reported the same to federal authorities and last week received the subpoena to appear Friday of this week.

17 YEARS AS SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENT

Seventeen years ago, Sunday, January 2nd., Rufus Strong, of Jackson ownship, was elected as superintendent of Rehoboth Sunday School, and today his school ranks among the best of the rural schools in DeKalb county. During his administration the school came into the 100 per cent class and each year they have held their place in the county standard in a most credible manner. It only goes to show what can be done in applying the remedy to the Sunday School ills, and what the results are when applied intelligntly.

Mr. Strong has a record that is hard to beat and one which shows that the rural school can apply the standard just as perfectly as a town school.

Seeing In the Distance and Reading

If you are young you may be able to do both these without glasses. That doesn't mean that your eyes are perfect, though, as some defect may be present in spite of the fact that you see well. But few people past middle life can see in the distance and read without some help. Middlenged persons should remember this, as the eyes are injured by neglect. Get the facts here.

COTTAGE CHEESE IS EASILY MADE

Haphazard Methods of Preparing Are Not Favored.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Haphazard methods of making cottage cheese result in a product that is sometimes palatable and sometimes otherwise. Especially if there is a surplus available for selling it is important that the flavor and quality of the cheese should be uniform at all times. This is only possible when exact methods are followed each time the cheese is made. The process itself is not at all difficult if directions given by the United States Department of Agriculture are accurately followed.

The Tennessee woman whose picture is shown has been extremely successful in making cottage cheese and selling it. She packs her product in the round waxed cardboard cartons, pint size, and makes only enough at a time to be sure of quick sales. She sees to it that the stores which handle the cheese always have a sufficient supply of absolutely fresh cheese.

Farmers' Bulletin 1451-F gives directions for making cottage cheese in the right way. In the case of quantity production, a "starter" or specially developed sour milk is recommended, and directions are given for preparing this starter properly; but in making small quantities for home use the following instructions may be followed:

Mrs. Bond of Tennessee Makes Cottage Cheese for Sale According to Instructions Given by the Home Demonstration Agent.

For 1½ pounds of cheese you will need one gallon of skim milk. If it is sweet place it in a pan and allow it to remain in a clean, warm place at a temperature of about 75 degrees Fahrenheit until it clabbers. The clabbered milk should have a clean, sour and pleasant flavor. It usually takes about 30 hours to clabber fresh milk, but when it is desirable to hasten the process a small quantity of well-flavored sour milk may be mixed with the sweet milk.

When firmly clabbered cut the curd into pieces about two inches square and stir it thoroughly with a spoon. Place the pan of broken curd in a vessel of hot water so as to raise the temperature to 100 degrees Fahrenheit. Cook at that temperature for about 30 minutes, stirring gently with a spoon for one minute at five-minute intervals.

Then pour the curd and whey into a small cheesecloth bag, such as a clean salt bag, or lay it upon a cloth and fold over the cloth to form a bag. Then hang it on a fruit-drainer rack or elsewhere to drain. Draining may be hastened by laying the bag between two pie plates or clean boards and placing a weight on top. Sometimes the curd is poured into a colander or strainer over which a piece of cheesecloth has been laid. In this case, after five or ten minutes, the curd should be worker toward the center of the colander with a spoon, and the ends of the cloth raised and lowered to make the whey drain faster. The cloth is finally hung up with its ends tied together. Draining should stop when the whey ceases to flow in a steady stream, to prevent the curd from becoming too dry.

Put the curd in a bowl and work it with a spoon or butter paddle until it becomes fine in grain, smooth and of the consistency of mashed potatoes. Sour or sweet cream may be added to increase the smoothness and palatability and improve the flavor. Salt to taste, usually about one tablespoonful of salt to one pound of curd. The cheese should be eaten as fresh as possible. If stored in an earthenware or glass container in a cool place it will keep for several days.

Sliced Ham and Potatoes Baked Together in Milk

If you have a casserole or any sort of baking dish which can be sent to the table, it can be utilized for serving sliced ham and potatoes, baked together in milk. If you have no suitable baking dish you can use an iron skillet with equally good results.

Have a slice of ham cut at least an inch thick. Lay it in a good-sized baking dish, add thinly sliced raw potatoes which have been sprinkled lightly with flour and pour over them enough milk to cover. Bake slowly for about an hour and a half, or until the potatoes and ham are thoroughly done. The salt and fat of the ham are sufficient to season the potatoes. If necessary add a little hot milk from time to time during cooking. There should be enough liquid to form a tasty gravy around the ham and potatoes and the top will be delicately browned like scalloped potatoes. Serve the ham and potatoes from the baking dish. If the ham is very salty, soak it, preferably in buttermilk or sour milk, before cooking it with the potatoes. The acid of sour milk seems to soften the ham and make it very tender when cooked.

WHITE MATERIALS USEFUL IN HOUSEHOLD

4-H Club Girls Learn to Select White Goods.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

White sales have long been associated with the beginning of the year. The thrifty housekeeper sees ahead the need for replenishments in household linens, underwear, and sometimes in summer dress materials which can be made up at her leisure during the early spring. She counts on the January sales to take care of some of these needs, because she knows that prices will be tempting and that there will be a good choice of materials and qualities.

Useful White Washable Material.

The term "household linens" includes practically all white or chiefly white washable materials used in household furnishing, whether made of linen or cotton. The housewife checks over for possible renewal such items as bedding, sheets, pillowcases, spreads, and mattress protectors; table cloths, napkins, doilies, centerpieces, tray cloths, luncheon sets, bureau and table covers, bath and other towels, wash cloths, kitchen towels. Sometimes cretonnes, prints and other washable figured materials are placed on sale with white goods by the yard during the month of January.

Those who make their underwear at home, watch for opportunities to buy nainsook, long cloth, batiste, English broadcloth and other suitable fabrics on the "white" tables. Some of these are also attractive for dresses and blouses, as well as heavier white goods like linen, poplin or galatea, for sports skirts and middies. Dress materials at white sales, however, are not all white. The white goods predominate, but colored ginghams, prints, percales and other wash fabrics are often specially priced at this season, so it pays to be on the lookout for bargains. Both white and colored linens may usually be found among the offerings at these sales.

Bulletin Will Help.

To help the woman who finds herself somewhat at a loss to choose among the great variety of cotton materials displayed, there is a Farmers' Bulletin, No. 1449-F, "Selection of Cotton Fabrics." To get it you merely write to the United States Department of Agriculture, at Washington, D. C. In it you will find a list of the best materials to use for each of the various household purposes, and in addition, a description of each of about a hundred fabrics, telling the kind of weave it has, and the common use for it.

Why not take your daughter with you to some of the white sales, after you have read the bulletin? You can then teach her how to recognize the difference between a flimsy and a durable fabric, how to detect filled or sized materials, how to notice defects in the fiber or weave, and many other good points. The 4-H club girls in the illustration are visiting a store with the home demonstration agent to learn some of these things.

CHAPTER V—Continued

As he went out he passed Doctor Maddox coming in.

"John," Mansfield said, "I sent for you because I wish to ask an honest man a few simple questions."

Maddox, plainly distressed, pulled his beard. "What's happened to you?"

"An inconceivable thing. I've fallen in love with something."

"What?"

"My daughter."

"Nothing abnormal about that. Tell me what you want to, and I'll answer as an honest friend."

"What do you know about this fellow Brandon Cathewe?"

"I know him to be as clean and white as a hound's tooth, Dunleigh. I'm glad you've fallen in love with Betty. It's bound to change your point of view. You've made Bannister prosperous, but on a rotten foundation. You have set out to break Cathewe because he is the first man who ever dared oppose you openly. And I don't believe you will succeed."

"Why?"

"Because he represents Right and you represent Might."

"That's plain speaking, John."

"You asked for it."

"All this is quite complimentary to me," said Mansfield, dryly. "Then you advise me to throw up my hands? John, my position is impregnable."

"On the money side, yes. Man, there's a great thing under your hand. Make a clean breast of it to that girl."

Mansfield drew his palm across his forehead. "First, I've got to find out where Cathewe got his four hundred thousand. Did you know that he had that amount in the local banks?"

"No."

"Do you accept him in your house as an equal?"

"Assuredly!"

"By George, that fellow has hypnotized you!"

"Not noticeably."

"So you have written down your boyhood friend as a rogue!"

"I won't answer that. I'll abide by what you have written down yourself"—shrewdly.

Mansfield laughed. "I'll travel on my own. But you won't find anything you'd call mean in the deal. I can promise you that. But one of us must break."

"I'm on the boy's side, Dunleigh," replied Maddox, getting up. "But I'll repeat my advice: Call up Cathewe; give him what he wants." Then the doctor left.

That night as he sat before the fire in the library, his office hours over, his pipe going comfortably, Nancy walked over and sat down in his lap, took the pipe from his teeth, and laid it on the ashtray. Then she seized his ears and drew his head right about face.

"Father Maddox, who is Digby Hallowell?"

His start nearly upset her. "Where did you hear that name?"

"From you."

"From me? But that's impossible!"

"Don't you know that you have lately acquired the habit of muttering out loud when you are overtired? Half a dozen times I have heard you mutter that name as if it were some tremendous thing."

"Nancy," he said, gravely, "you will do father a great favor if you will forget you ever heard me utter it. I feel, by uttering that name aloud, even unconsciously, that I have broken my faith as a physician.

* * * * * * *

When the advertising men of the various shops penitently entered the business office of the Herald the next morning, asking to renew their contracts, the business manager called up Cathewe, who had an extension telephone at the side of his bed. Drowsily Cathewe caught the first few words, then he became wide awake.

"All of them?"

"Yes, sir. They want their spaces back tomorrow."

"The old contracts are dead."

"I've got new ones all ready, with the cash line blank. Do you want to come down, or shall I handle it?"

"I'll leave it to you. But listen carefully. The Herald has gained twenty thousand since those chaps deserted us. Add twenty per cent to the old scale."

"Wouldn't it be better to soak them with the January renewal?"

"You don't understand the big thing that's happened. These fellows are not in the office because they are sorry for us. They are up against a wall, and we're the only way out. Twenty per cent and a year's run. When a man offers you a Corona, you don't ask for a stogie. Those are the terms. They can take them or leave them. Call me up when they go." Cathewe sro[illegible]self with his pillows and stared at the telephone for a full half hour; and when the telephone finally rang again, the hair on his forehead was damp. "Well?" he said.

"Not a whimper. One year, with a twenty per cent raise, and they seemed glad to sign. In a couple of months—if the print-paper holds out—we'll be carrying money to the banks."

"I'll be with you at four."

Cathewe set the telephone down with a bang, kicked the bedclothes high into the air, turned a somersault and landed with a thud on the floor. He picked himself up, laughing, flung his bathrobe across his shoulders, and dashed down the hall to the bathroom. It was only after nine, but that did not matter.

"I've won mother," he said, as he came storming into the dining room, his eyes glistening and his fine skin ruddy.

"Think of it! The most puzzling, tantalising, quicksilvery thing on earth—the public—went out and won this fight for me because they saw I was playing fair!

"Queer sheep that they are, they would turn against me tomorrow, if they knew! Mother, I'm being watched. I can't prove it, but I sense it continually. Mansfield has just received a bitter blow to his prestige. He's not going to leave any stone unturned to do me injury."

He ate his breakfast hurriedly, then bolted into the study. For a little while she could hear him humming some bars from the "Second Polonaise"; then silence. Thereafter she and the maid moved about their work without sound. He wrote steadily until three, on his book; then he went to the office. He worked hard, arranged a new advertising schedule with his business manager and left the office at five o'clock. It was growing dark. He always walked home, even in bad weather.

It was dark, but still a little too early for the street lamps. The darkness was partly due to the heavy raincloud that were sweeping across the sky. Obliquely he saw two men across the street apparently talking to a woman. What made him turn his head and look squarely, he never knew. Ordinarily, he would have continued on. This single look was enough. He broke into a run. When he arrived he did not ask questions. He knocked one of the men flat and whirled the other into the gutter.

"Can I be of assistance?" he said, turning to the woman. Then he saw who it was. "Miss Mansfield! What in the world are you doing alone in this quarter of the town? Here, take my arm. My home is only a few blocks away. I'll call a taxi and you can have a cup of tea while you wait."

"If you please! I . . . I'm rather upset. One of them touched me!" Cathewe stopped. "No, no! Please do not go back. My chauffeur must have misunderstood my directions, for I left him by the curb here."

"I'm so glad I happened along."

"So am I."

And they started on, but neither could think of anything else to say.

"Here we are," he said, when they at last reached the house.

"Is that you, sonny?"

What a pleasant voice! thought the girl, her astonishment at full tide.

"Yes, mother. Will you ring for lights and tea? I have company—Miss Mansfield, whose chauffeur misunderstood her instructions."

The girl heard a flurry of skirts in the room beyond, the tinkle of a bell, and then in a kind of dream Betty entered the living-room.

"Can you see the lounge?" he asked.

"Y[illegible]

Almost at once the maid came in with a Roman candelabrum, which she placed on the piano.

"You'll excuse me a moment," said Cathews, "while I call a taxi"; and he stepped into the hall.

Mrs. Cathewe sat down again and played Greig's "Papillon," played it without taking her gaze off this flower-like young woman; and Betty felt powerless to shift her eyes. She had entered an enchanted castle, and the mystic inhabitants had laid a spell upon her. She was not conscious of moving. Did she drink a cup of tea? She could not remember. She recollected nothing until the door of the taxicab slammed behind her.

Betty peered from the side window and received a distinct shock. Why, this Ali Baba's cave was almost opposite Nancy's! Nancy knew them. She must know them!

The moment she arrived home she was astonished to note that it was seven. She had been in that quaint house almost two hours. She ran to the telephone and called a number.

"Doctor Maddox, please." She had to wait a minute.

"Hello!"

"This is Betty Mansfield, doctor. I've a question to ask. Who lives in that little white house across the street from you, the house with the picket fence?"

"There are four or five white houses across the street."

"Thanks!" With an indignant gesture she set the receiver on the hook.

Cathewe usually remained at his desk until the paper was ready for the press, which was about three o'clock in the morning. But tonight at twelve he turned the office over to the night editor. He wanted to get out of doors, walk. His head was full of the girl. He could not dismiss the vivid picture of her.

Cathewe's long stride carried him to his own gate. He was in the act of opening it when a pistol shot cut through the silence sharply.

CHAPTER VI

Longing.

Cathewe broke into a run toward the rear of the house. He saw a man dash from the kitchen and make for the back fence. There was no way of cutting him off, but there was a chance of putting a hand on him before he could scale the high board fence. Cathewe touched the man's coat tail, but futilely.

"Mother?" he called, thundering through the kitchen into the dining room. "Mother?"

"Yes, sonny! I'm all right," came from his study. "I fired only to frighten him. He was rifling your safe. Was there anything of value there?"

"Only odds and ends of manuscripts and my dramatic contracts. This is Mansfield. That money in the bank is bothering him. He begins to feel that he must find out. But I must go to New York tomorrow night, even if I'm followed."

"There goes the bell!" exclaimed Mrs. Cathewe.

"Probably the patrolman."

It was. Cathewe offered him a cup of coffee, and the three of them sat around the kitchen table, discussing the affair.

Then Mrs. Cathewe described the man minutely.

"I'd let the matter drop," the patrolman said suddenly.

"Clary, which are you for?" Cathewe demanded.

"What do you mean?"

"Are you for Mansfield or for Bannister?"

"Bannister, Mr. Cathewe. But for all that, my job is my bread and butter. You know the department as well as I do. You're up against a real war. You'll never get anything on Mansfield that'll hold water in court."

Cathewe let the matter drop, and the policeman left.

At precisely this moment the telephone rang in Mansfield's library. Mansfield laid aside his book.

"Hello!"

"This Mr. Mansfield?"

"Yes."

"There wasn't anything."

Mansfield hung up the receiver, but he did not reach for the book he had been reading. Instead he stared into space.

He was thinking and thinking hard. The truth is, he was trying to fight his way through the gossamer net Betty had thrown about him. He sensed with panic that the fiber which had made him a power in the land was softening.

Again, his imagination took another turn. He seemed to be walking in a valley of echoes. "Give Betty what she wants." "Give me what I want." "Give Cathewe what he wants." "Give."

The thought of Cathewe, however, always had the effect of a tonic upon a man at low ebb. To crush this meddling whippersnapper, break him and scatter him like dust.

The sum of all these psychological incursions and cogitations was this: Mansfield was giving Betty what she wanted, giving it to her because he loved her and because another phrase of Maddox' was of recurrent quality.

Arrive as Strangers in National Capital

One of the outstanding features of Washington's difference from other capitals of great countries is that it is not—as are London, Paris and Berlin—the most important of our cities, nor indeed a city at all in that sense, writes Maude Parker Child in the Saturday Evening Post.

Therefore most of the appointees who come to our capital come as strangers. [illegible] countries the chances are that a man chosen as a cabinet member will be known in his own capital and will have a wide acquaintance there. His social status will have been established long before he becomes part of the government.

In the United States, however, a new official may come from a town as remote geographically from Washington as Constantinople is from Dublin. His wife and children may have never even seen the city of their new residence until they go there to live. It is possible that they may not have one friend who is a resident.

This applies equally to the undersecretaries and to the innumerable men of the State department, but it is usually more acute in the cases of senators and congressmen.

THE CHRISTIAN'S USE OF HIS BIBLE

LESSON TEXT—Deut. 6:4-9; II Tim. 3:14-17.

GOLDEN TEXT—Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path.

PRIMARY TOPIC—The Best Book in the World.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Studying our Marching Orders.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—How to Read and Study the Bible.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—How to Get Help From the Bible.

I. God's Instructions to Israel as to the Use of the Scriptures (Deut. 6:4-9).

1. The central truths to be taught (vv. 4, 5).

(1) The unity of God (v. 4).

"The Lord our God is one Lord." This was a testimony against the polytheism existing among the Gentiles of that day.

(2) Man's supreme obligation (v. 5).

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul and might." God should be loved with all the heart, soul and might because He is the alone and supreme God. This being the first and great commandment, we know what is man's supreme duty.

2. How these truths are to be kept alive (vv. 6-9).

"These words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart." In order that God's Word might be in the heart they were enjoined—

(1) To teach them diligently unto thy children (v. 7).

The most important part of a child's education is that given in the home in the Word of God.

(2) "Shall talk of them when thou sittest in thine house" (v. 7).

This is the right kind of home life.

(3) Shall talk of them when walking with our children and friends (v. 7).

What more interesting, important and uplifting topic upon which to converse with our friends.

(4) Shall talk of them when retiring for the night (v. 7).

The last thing upon which the mind should rest before going to sleep should be God and His truth.

(5) Talk of them when rising in the morning (v. 7).

How fitting that God should speak to us through His Word the first thing when we awake.

(6) "Bind them upon thine hand for a sign" (v. 8).

This was literally done by the Jews as portions of the Scriptures were worn upon their wrists.

(7) "They shall be as frontlets between thine eyes" (v. 8).

This also was literally done by the Jews even to wearing portions of the Scriptures in little boxes between eyes.

(8) "Thou shalt write them on the posts of thy house and on thy gates" (v. 9). They were to be constantly before their eyes.

II. Paul's Instruction to Timothy as to the Scriptures (II Tim. 3:14-17).

In this chapter Paul makes clear to Timothy that perilous times would come. False teachers would arise within the church and lead astray sentimental and unsuspecting people as neurotic women. People professing godliness would deny its power by godless living. So awful will this condition be that those who live godly lives shall suffer persecution. Paul's own life of suffering was an example of what fidelity and testimony would bring. In the last days he predicts that this attitude on the part of these false teachers would be intensified, for "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse."

In the face of such trying circumstances Paul exhorts Timothy—

1. To remain steadfast, to abide in the eternal truths which had been taught to him (v. 14).

He assures him that though trying times would come and violent storms of opposition would beat heavily upon him, Timothy would find the Word of God an abiding, unshaken foundation. The Holy Scriptures will abide even when heaven and earth have passed away; therefore the necessary thing is to abide in them.

2. The knowledge furnished by the Word of God was sufficient for the perplexing and trying times through which he was to pass (v. 15). The Bible furnishes wisdom which can be found in no other place. This wisdom, as all true wisdom, leads straight to Jesus Christ, who gives salvation.

3. The Scriptures are inspired of God (v. 16).

Inspiration here means "God breathed." Because of this fact they should be held with confidence.

Abiding in the Scriptures will perfectly equip the minister for his work (v. 17).

How Jesus Saw Men

Jesus divided men into two classes and no more; either on the narrow or on the broad way; either a good tree or a bad tree; either a wise or a foolish builder; in a word, either for Christ or against Him.—Plummer.

Service

The quality of the service is the measure of the result. It is not length of service, but intensity, sincerity, enthusiasm that tells.—R. J. Campbell.

Quart of Water Cleans Kidneys

Take a Little Salts If Your Back Hurts, or Bladder is Troubling You

No man or woman can make a mistake by flushing the kidneys occasionally, says a well-known authority. Eating too much rich food creates acids, which excite the kidneys. They become overworked from the strain, get sluggish and fail to filter the waste and poisons from the blood. Then we get sick. Rheumatism, headaches, liver trouble, nervousness, dizziness, sleeplessness and urinary disorders often come from sluggish kidneys.

The moment you feel a dull ache in the kidneys, or your back hurts, or if the urine is cloudy, offensive, full of sediment, irregular of passage or attended by a sensation of scalding, begin drinking a quart of water each day, also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy; take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast and in a few days your kidneys may act fine.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to flush and stimulate the kidneys; also to help neutralize the acids in the system, so they no longer cause irritation, thus often relieving bladder weakness.

Jad Salts is inexpensive; makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which everyone should take now and then to help keep the kidneys clean and active and the blood pure, thereby often avoiding serious kidney complications.

Makes Guns More Deadly

A new fire control instrument for the operation of anti-aircraft guns has been perfected by the United States Navy department. The device, which transmits electrically all firing data to the anti-aircraft batteries, is said to direct shell fire with such accuracy that anti-aircraft gunners can anticipate the path of a flying plane, and by merely setting the fuse of an explosive shell can fire so the shell and plane will meet at a previously calculated point. The instrument is described as having 40,000 working parts.

Taxis Travel on Water

"Water taxis" are to be used in Amsterdam for service in the canals which wind about the city. The taxis will accommodate two to four persons and are really small motorboats with cabins, the taximeter being attached to the shaft of the propeller. The taxis were decided upon to meet the increased growth of the city on both sides of the River Ij, as well as the other waterways of the city and nearby districts.

HEALTH CLASSES FOR LADIES IMPORTANT

The classes for women which are being conducted by Dr. Teal and Nancy Gibbs, a trained nurse representing the State Board of Child Health division, have been quite well attended in the different parts of the county last week. Indications point to increased interest in the lectures and demonstrations scheduled for the next three weeks.

Every lady in the community ought to attend and learn of the methods in the care of children. The enrollment for theclasses last week was small in some places. Below we give the number in attendance:—

Auburn high school, 104; Garrett high school, 151; Auburn Library, 35; Jackson Township Center, 5; Waterloo, 25; Corunna, 44; Butler, 41; Garrett, 20; Butler Center, 8; St. Joe, 46; Newville, 20; Spencerville, 48; at the Butler high school class Franklin had one lady present; Troy had six ladies present; Stafford township had nine ladies present and Wilmington township had two ladies present; at the Corunna class Fairfield township had twenty-four ladies present; Richland township had twenty ladies present and at the Waterlo class Smithfield township had six ladies present and Grant township had nineteen ladies present.

MARRIAGES INCREASE 54% IN COUNTY

The number of marriage licenses issued in 1926 in DeKalb county was236, as compared with 153 in 1925, an increase of 54 per cent.

The statistical report for the year made by County Clerk J. Harver Knauer indicates a new record in permits to wed. Over a period of many years, it is found that the closest number to the 1926 record is 229, issued in 1913. In the war year of 1917 there were only 192 and in 1918 the number was only 141. The year 1926 was by far the best since 1920, when there were 221 licenses. The 1921 record was 183; 1922 showed 152; 1923, 178; 1924, 154; 1925, 153.

The number of divorces also took a jump in the year from 32 to 42, or 31 per cent. However, this has been equaled or beaten numerous times. The year of 1916 was exceptionally high, with 48. Of the decrees entered in 1926, wives were granted 32 and husbands10.

The statistical report also shows that during 1926, 307 civil cases that originated in the county were filed and 19 were venued here from other courts. Th number pending at the end of the year was 283, plus 111 claims against estates and real estate sales in process.

The number of persons adjudged of unsound mind during the last year was 9, which is exactly the number of 1925. Criminal cases pending at the beeginning of 1926 was 75. The number filed during the year was 72, the number dismissed was 22 and the number in which judgment was entered was 41, leaving 35 on the docket at the end of the year. The number of pending criminal cases was thus reduced by more than half during the year. During 1925 judgment was entered in 48 criminal cases and 29 were dismissed.

DEEDS AND MORTGAGES FILED IN RECORDER'S OFFICE

The annual report of S. F. Morr former county recorder, for the year 1926 shows that 443 warranty and quitclaim deeds were filed during the year, besides 13 sheriff's deeds and 14 auditor's deeds.

The amount of consideration in all the deeds was $775,621. There were 373 one dollar considerations. The number of other miscellaneous papers filed was 236.

Mortgages on farms and lands not in towns and cities numbered 212, amount, $475,283; satisfactions, 235, amount, $456,675.

Mortgages on lots, city and town property numbered 468, amount, $443,334; satisfactions, 313, amount, $336,666.

School fund mortgages numbered 11, amount $17,450; satisfactions, 2, amount, $500.

Chattel mortgages filed numbered 540, amount, $193,614; satisfactions, 110, amount, $59,119.

Liens filed numbered 95, amount, $18,942; satisfactions, 61, amount, $21,764.

The total number of mortgages and liens was 1,726, amount, $1,148,623; satisfactions, 721, amount $874,724.

COUNTY K. OF P. MEETING AUBURN, JANUARY 28

DeKalb county Knights of Pythias are looking forward to the night of January 28 when a great county meeting will be held in Castle Hall in Auburn to be addressed by the Supreme Prelate of the order, Frederick S. Atwood of Minneapolis, Minn.

The meeting will be open to Knights of Pythias and prospective candidates for the order.

Mr. Atwood has the reputation of being one of the most forceful orators on the platform. He is totally blind. He became blind through his devotion to the Knights of Pythias order.

Driving through a blizzard in Minnesota January 6, 1905, to install the officers of Garden City Lodge at Garden City, Minnesota, he lost his hat in the storm and through exposure his eyes were frozen. It resulted in total physical blindness. All lodges in DeKalb county will be represented at the meeting.

ORGANIZATION OF THE TOWNSHIP TRUSTEES

The township trustees of DeKalb county reorganized at their meeting in the office of County Superintendent Clarence Green at the court house Wednesday afternoon of last week by electing the following officers:

President, Larry Brandon of Union township.

Vice president, Frank E. Lyons of Wilmington township.

Secretary, August Kukuck of Smithfield township.

Treasurer, Wm. G. Erick of Spencer township.

BIBLE READING IN INDIANA SCHOOLS

Ku Klux Klan to Support Bill Providing for Several Chapters Each Day Without Comment

Daily Bible reading in the public schools and an amendment to the teachers' licensing act making it more definitive were agreed upon as the 1927 legislature objectives of the Ku Klux Klan at its banquet at Indianapolis Tuesday night.

Of 48 legislators reported belonging to the order, 26 answered the invitation of W. Lee Smith, grand dragon for Indiana.

The bill for reading of the Bible in the public schools would require the reading of a definite number of chapters each day, the lesson to be closed without comment. Children who did not desire to participate or whose parents objected would not be required to do so.

Supplanting the unsuccessful effort of the last session of the general assembly when a klan bill would have made it impossible to obtain a teacher's license unless an education had been secured in the public schools, the new amendment will demand that the curriculum of the high school from which the candidate for license has graduated shall be on a par with the standard of the public schools of the state.

The proposed amendment eliminates the features which caused much of the acrimonious discussion of the 1925 session and which would have barred students of military academies and other private institutions of learning.

OBITUARY

Samuel Hemry, son of Samuel and Margaret Hemry, was born near Perrysville, Carrol County, Ohio, March 16, 1844 and passed away at his late residence in Kinderhook township, Branch county, Mich., Dec. 22, 1926, at the age of 82 years, 9 months and 6 days.

When he was six years of age the family moved near Hicksville, Defiance county, Ohio. When eight years of age, as was so often done by poor families of those pioneer days, he was bound out until he was of age. Therefore he did not have the opportunity of obtaining th meager education of those pioneer days.

On October 25, 1870, he was united in marriage with Rebecca Harding and they traveled the pathway of life fr nearly 52 years, when on March 21, 1922 the wife and mother passed away.

To this union were born two daughters Ellen Elizabeth and Isobelle who died in infancy.

He lived near Hicksvillee, Ohio and St. Joe, Indiana, where he was a pioner in the full sense of the word, clearing away the forests and ditching the swales, that the next generation might profit thereby.

April 6, 1905, th family moved to the present home in Kinderhook, which with the exception of short intervals in Algansee and Batavia townships and James township Steuben county, Indiana, has been the family home.

Of the family three brothers and one sister, as far as w know one brother, Haman Hemry, who is touring th southwst and can not be found at the present time, alone remains. The daughter, Ellen, grandson, Archie Milliman, and great granddaughter, Martha Elizabeth Milliman, who has been the pride of his heart for the past nine months, survive.

Th father and grandfather will be missed in the home and Uucle Sam will be missed in the community as a good and honest neighbor.

Funeral services were held at the residence at 1:30 p. m. Friday, Dec. 24. Interment in the Knauss cemetery. Rv. C. W. McKenzie of Coldwater officiated.

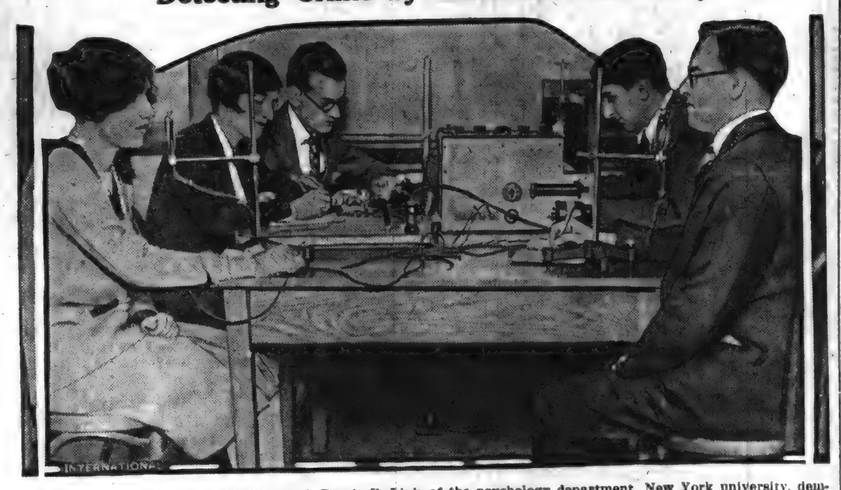
Detecting Crime by Electrical Machinery



By use of an "electrical third degree," Dr. A. P. Link of the psychology department, New York university, demonstrated that crime can be detected by machinery. Three persons were used as subjects, one of them being supposed to have knowledge of a "crime" and the others to know nothing of it. The three were subjected to successful tests by three electrical devices to determine the guilty party. One machine records the time required to answer questions. A second device, the electrical stethoscope, magnified the heart beat, and the third was an apparatus for measuring electrical resistance of the human skin.

FARM POULTRY

RIGHT CARE AND FEED FOR EGGS

In the summer the farm hen may forage for a supply of animal feed and garner all the available bugs, worms, and green feed needed to replenish worn-out body tissue and to produce an abundant quantity of eggs. But winter has come now and the bugs are gone. So has the green feed on many farms and the hen must be fed if she is expected to produce eggs in profitable quantities.

"Eggs are high-priced in the winter because so few farm hens are laying at this season," says Dr. B. F. Kaupp, head of the poultry department at South Carolina State college. "The two usual reasons for low egg production are found in the poor producing power of the hen and also because she may not have the proper food and care. If the hen comes from a high producing strain and is not laying as she should, it is possible that she may not have a comfortable house, or that she is not free of parasites, and does not have the right kind of feed and other care."

Doctor Kaupp states that eggs are low in price during the spring months because everybody's hens are laying then. Eggs always go down in the spring and the farmers' organizations should store eggs at that season. In the winter eggs go up to 75 cents and $1 per dozen because the hens are not laying. Then the storage houses bring out the cheap spring eggs to sell at a good profit.

The poultry department has prepared extension circulars 155, 156 and 158 which tell how to put the farm flock on a paying basis. These bulletins are free and will tell how to cull and feed the birds for winter eggs. It should be remembered, states Doctor Kaupp, that laying hens must have mash before them at all times. The mash must contain crushed grains, minerals, fish or meat meal, or the surplus milk of the farm. Tender, green feed is also needed each day. Water should be constantly before the birds and the grain feed given them twice each day.

Most Poultry Diseases Can Easily Be Conquered

A broom, shovel, scraper and a spray pump with some crude oil or other good spray material will conquer most poultry diseases. The University of Nebraska lists these remedies as the best for most poultry diseases. Unfortunately, they also require energy and initiative on the part of the flock owner. It is much easier to put pills or dope in the drinking water after the hens are sick than it is to scald the fountains and clean up the house.

Of course, poultry yields to treatment the same as other live stock but why allow sickness to gain a foothold in the first place? Furthermore, the fellow who pins too much faith on bright-colored, strong-smelling medicines usually forgets to remove the cause of the trouble. A little study usually proves it to be over-crowding, poor ventilation, filth and vermin. Disease will cure the overcrowding, but it is an expensive method. Just plain prevention is all most poultry raisers need to avoid losses.

Profits Increased From Hens by Use of Lights

Tests at the Nebraska experiment station last winter on two pens of 90 leghorns each showed that electric lights increased the income from 90 hens $25.44. The hens in both lots were as near alike as possible and both groups were kept in ordinary houses.

Both pens received exactly the same care except that one was lighted at 5 o'clock each morning and the other was not. Pullets well matured and ready to lay by November 1 respond to lights all winter. Yearling hens that have molted late should not be forced before January 1. Morning light proved more practical from the standpoint of feed and management. Scratch feed was scattered in the litter at night so the hens could go to work in the morning as soon as an alarm turned on the lights.

Breeding Pens

Although the average poultry man cannot afford to trapnest his hens, he can greatly improve his flock by making a special breeding pen of his best male bird and a few choice hens or pullets. In choosing these breeders both egg producing and standard qualities should be kept in mind. By toe-marking or banding chicks hatched from this pen it will be found that the chicks hatched from the eggs from this pen will be superior to those from the general flock.

Dry Mash for Hens

The amount of dry mash that the hens eat is usually determined by the amount of scratch feed given to the flock. Satisfactory results are obtained by feeding twice as much scratch feed as mash during the winter months, the ratio being reversed during the summer and spring months. It is a good plan to give the heaviest feed late in the afternoon. Succulent feeds like alfalfa, clover, sprouted oats, etc., are rich in vitamines, and have an excellent effect on the digestive system.

Old Folks Need a Mild Laxative —Not a "Physic"

Most men and women past fifty must give to the bowels some occasional help, else they suffer from constipation. One might as well refuse to aid weak eyes with glasses as to neglect a gentle aid to weak bowels.

Is your present laxative, in whatever form, promoting natural bowel "regularity"—or must you purge and "physic" every day or two to avoid sick headache, dizziness, biliousness, colds, or sour, gassy stomach?

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin helps to establish natural, regular bowel movement even for those chronically constipated. It never gripes, sickens or upsets the system. Besides, it is absolutely harmless and pleasant to take.

Pretty Things that are Made at Home

HAVE you heard of the new tricotine costume flowers, made of crepe paper? If not, you are surely missing something worth while. Like everyone who sees them, at first glance you will be wanting a boutonniere to wear on your coat, or a shoulder bouquet. They make charming wrist bouquets, too, which, as you know, are quite the vogue this season. To buy as elaborate a costume corsage as the one photographed at the top of this group would be quite an expensive proposition—but why buy, when these lovely dress accessories can be made so easily at home and at a trifling cost?

As to material required, ask at any dry goods store at the counter where gold metal cloth and novelty yard goods is sold, for silver or gold (as you prefer) tricotine, which is a thin, cobweb-like metal cloth. Provide also "annealed" wire, such as is used for making paper flowers, this same being very pliable but not brittle, and add to this collection crepe paper of any chosen color. For the shoulder bouquet of half-blown roses, proceed as follows:

Take a piece of crepe paper and stretch it slightly. For the three center petals cut pieces eight inches long and four wide. Fold the strip lengthwise not quite in half. Stretch the metallic tricotine over this. Fold one corner down and start rolling in a loose roll. Tie this firmly at the base with wire. For the six petals surrounding the three flower centers, cut a strip of crepe paper a half inch wide across the grain. Cut a five-inch square of tricotine, fold it cornerwise. Lay the strip of crepe paper in the fold and gather the two sides of the tricotine triangle together. Stretch and press down a little to make a shapely flat-looking petal. Tie with a piece of wire the same length. Finish off with a tricotine covered stem. For the four drops that hang, cut three-and-a-half-inch squares of the paper. Fold cornerwise, then form a cone around the forefinger. Gather at the bottom and cover with a square of tricotine. These costume corsages are exquisite if worked up in pastel shades of crepe paper.

For the boutonniere, arrange petals around a center of yellow rose stamens. Make the leaves of green crepe paper.

The butterfly wrist ornament is of paper, hand-painted and gathered into a body with "feelers" of spool wire.

When all is written and said, the winter of 1926-27 will go down as "a velvet season." Whenever a frock for evening or daytime wear, likewise a wrap, a suit or a blouse is suggested, it is almost always taken for granted that it is to be of velvet.

Perhaps some of us are planning to indulge in "just one more new frock" to tide over midwinter to spring. To be sure it may correctly be of satin, crepe or fine woolen, but why not join the majority and choose velvet? There's nothing quite so pretty and practical, also appropriate for wintry days as a simply fashioned velvet frock, either in black or of color, finished at neck and sleeves with real crochet or filet collar and cuffs.

Paris adds zest to the velvet mode by continuing to send over some ravishing frocks. There is the one in this picture, for instance. It is a creation from Jenny, designed for smart afternoon wear. Its ermine bordered front apron panel at once attracts, in that it bears the cachet of the unusual. A lovely detail is the turquoise-blue taffeta which edges the narrow cuffs and cuffs of ermine. This touch of blue whispers a secret in regard to spring fashions—a vogue for blue of all tones is on the way.

If a dress entire of velvet does not carry appeal, here's something sure to interest you—a sleeveless velvet jacket to be worn indoors over a crepe or satin frock. Quite the smartest item of the moment is a fancifully embroidered jacket of velvet, sans sleeves, just below hip length, collarless and flowing open at the front, without fastening. One will readily see what opportunities this jacket offers to add a style-touch to one's crepe frock.

Very Cautious Writers.

Cautiousness might also be called practicality and is distinguished in the writing by small style of script, usually vertical and often back-hand. A lack of impulse is indicated in the writing of a cautious person. As the emotional and impulsive person writes large it is therefore natural that the cautious person write a small style.

T bars and i dots are carefully made, exactly placed by one who is cautious. Terminals are cut short. They do not run out to meet the other fellow or the other word to follow but many times turn back to the mind of the person who made them. They are the same signs that indicate hesitancy on the part of the writer.

T-bars in the writing of the cautious rarely cross the upright far to the right. They are usually made beginning far to the left and stop when they reach the upright. This means that the writer is afraid to step forward and take the chance. He lacks the gambling spirit.

Writing that is done slowly (trace with pencil or toothpick) and writing that is well formed is invariably done by a cautious person. When letters are well rounded and when they sometimes decrease in size as word goes on we are sure to find caution in the writer.

Is He Stubborn?

Stubbornness or obstinacy is an excellent quality if it goes hand in hand with a mind with a purpose. It carries with it a certain love of principle, but without good signs of intellect, obstinacy degenerates to mere narrowness and prejudice.

it would

One of the most interesting signs of much obstinacy are d's and t's which come below the line, resembling the figure 7. There is nearly always a tendency to angularity in the writing. Amusing little fish hooks are attached to the terminals of words when the individual goes after his own way and sticks to it, though this is not always present in the stubborn writing.

As a rule, the writing is applied with firm pressure, more than with a lacy fineness. Stubborn writers indicate their energy and physical resistance also, which they need if they are to hold onto their own way, by choosing f's and t's with little whip like loops. Loops are often pointed.

We must convince the intellectual stubborn man with scientific facts, but the nonintellectual one must be babied into letting him think he has his own way, if we want to get him to listen at all.

Is He Practical?

The man or woman who is able to to be practical, at least two-thirds of the time, has the problem of life pretty well in hand. Here is the way your sweetheart's writing will look if he or she is analytical enough to be practical:

friendly

something to say

Time-Saving Strokes.

Simplified writing—doing in the quickest way, the slogan of the practical person—is the simple key to this type of writer.

No terminals, few curves, even pressure, t bars exacting and rightly placed are some of the keys of practicability to be found in his writing.

The letter t will have the half below the line often made by one straight line instead of a loop. The terminal of a word will often turn back to cross a t and small y's will have only the single downstroke. There will be no sign of curves that might be called exaggerated. And in cases where the writer is exceptionally practical we will find a style that gives the appearance of the printed word—often his words are actually printed, and again they have a resemblance to engraving.

Note.—Do not make final judgment until other signs in writing are studied.

Famous "Greek Fire"

The fire invented and used by Callimachus in 668 A. D. to destroy the ships of the invading Saracens was composed of naphtha or liquid bitumen mixed with sulphur and pitch procured from green fir trees. Water, instead of extinguishing, quickened this agent, which the Greeks controlled with sand, wine and vinegar. The secret was maintained by the Greeks for 400 years.

When Winter Comes
Good Elimination Is Essential

HABITS of life change with the changing seasons. Winter brings us more indoors; we are apt to get less fresh air and exercise, to eat heavier food and to be less active generally. These winter-time habits impose heavier burdens upon our hard-working kidneys.

Sluggish kidney function permits retention of poisonous waste in the blood and makes one an easier victim of winter's colds and chills. Presence of these unfiltered toxins makes itself felt in many unpleasant ways. One is apt to feel tired, achy and listless — to have drowsy headaches, dizziness and perhaps a dull, "toxic" backache. That the kidneys are not functioning as they should is often shown by scanty or burning secretions.

At such times the use of a stimulant diuretic* to the kidneys is indicated. Doan's Pills act on the kidneys only. Grateful users the country over recommend them. Ask your neighbor!

*Diuretics are agents which increase the secretion of the kidneys—Encyclopaedia definition.

YEAR'S CHRONOLOGY OF LOCAL EVENTS

Year 1926

The St. Joe News is first in the county to attempt a thing of this kind. Every issue of 1926 papers have been scanned in order that the outstanding local news items might be given an a years summary. It has been a custom of the publishers of the inside pages of this paper, which is known in newspaper parlance, as ready print, to give to the subscribers of this paper a chronological list of the world's most outstanding events.

The editor of this paper conceived the idea that the same course could be pursued in regard to local history; that it would be a pleasing innovation, that would be acceptable to our subscribers. We hope you will like it, and, should any omissions occur, and, mistakes will happen, we hope you will cover all with the mantle of charity; and attribute the mistakes or omissions as of the head and not of the heart. We have tried to be fair to all.

Looking Back For 50 Years

Fifty years ago this year a national banking system was started in the United States.

Today Americans have on deposit and subject to check or drawing interest the unheardof sum of $60,000,000,000

If you do not own a part of that vast sum, you can still profit through the experience of others. You can still make your dollars wor for you—and a working dollar is the only dollar worth having.

Or you can do your boy or girl a wonderful favor by taking even one dollar and starting an account for them—and then teaching them how thrift and saving has made thes United States the most prosperous, the most contented, the happiest nation in the world.

No Man Ever Saved Without First Starting To Save And No Man Ever Lost Anything Yet By Starting.

CAME NEAR BEING ASPHYXIATED

Mrs. Ella Gill, who resides alone, was found prostrate on the floor early Tuesday morning, by Charles Woodcox and Rev. McKnight, who gained entrance to her home by way of the cellar.

Upon going to the Gill home in the morning they could not get in but could hear her moaning. She was cold and becoming rigid, having been on the floor since early in the morning, when she was overcome by the gas from the base burner, caused by the damper being shut off tight in the pipe. She still was clad in her night clothes indicating her getting up early.

She had been accustomed to burning soft coal during the day and hard coal at night, in her base burner and had the damper in the pipe been opened, no harm would have resulted.

Dr. Shook was called and for a half day administered hot applications and by noon she was able to talk.

TOWNSHIP CONVENTION JANUARY 30th.

January 30th, will be a big day in St. Joe Churches. The annual township convention is to be held with Hartwell Gosney, of Fort Wayne, as the speaker, both morning and afternoon.

There will be a union Sunday School with the children meeting in the Christian Church, the young people in the Lutheran Church and the adults in the Methodist Church.

The morning service will be held at the Methodist Church following the Sunday School.

The evening session will be in charge of the young people. Special music by the Glee Club. Miss Annise Harding, of Corunna, will be the speaker.

Saturday evening will be a worker's council in which county officers will participate. Plan for this event.

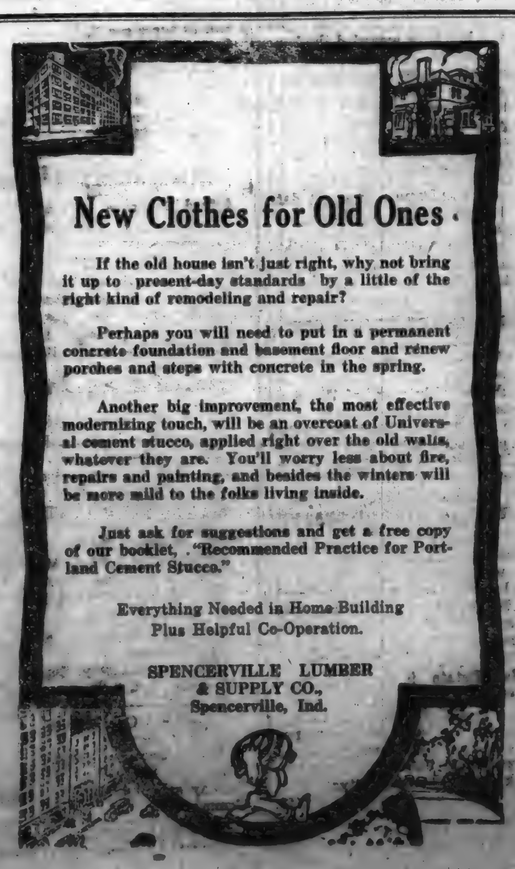
RED FOX CAUGHT NEAR SPENCERVILLE

Virgil Koch was in town Saturday exhibiting a red fox that he shot last Thursday, with a rifle, on the Byron Welch farm, east of Horn's school house.

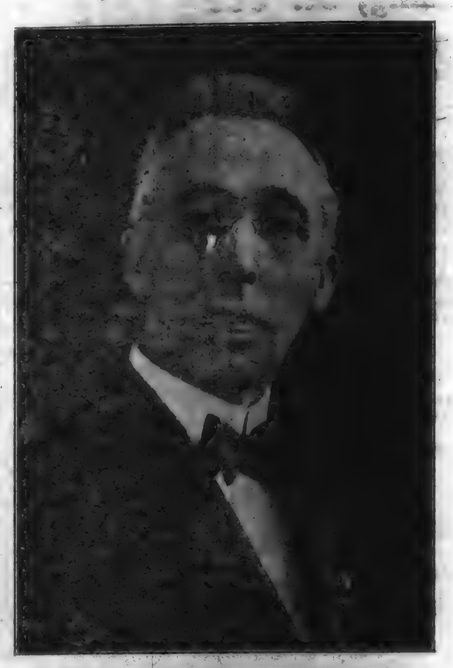
Virgil and Bernard McNabb had made a chase of a few days. A number of times they were close enough to the animal to shoot, but being near a flock of sheep and at another time was among the flock, making it dangerous to shoot.

There are a number of foxes reported as running wild east and south, but this is the first one that has been captured.

George Strong, Clyde Mason and Wm. Hamilton shipped a load of fat hogs to Pittsburgh, Monday, by B. & O.



One of the Headline Speakers on County Convention Program



REV. E. D. STONE, BALTIMORE, MD.

One of the main speakers secured for the DeKalb County Sunday School Convention to be held at Butler, February 10th and 11th., is the Reverend E. D. Stone, D. D., of Baltimore, Md., pastor of the Hampdem Methodist Protestant Church. Dr. Stone as a pastor and evangelist has made an astonishing record with his church in the past sixteen years, becoming pastor of the church when it was small and weak in numbers. His ability to deal with all classes of men has been most remarkable as he is, now, teacher of one of the largest Men's Bible Classes in America, having at present an enrollment of twelve hundred men. During a city wide revival campaign in Baltimore he had the privilege and honor of leading twelve hundred of his men in a parade to the tabernacle.

Dr. Stone is not only a leader of men, but every department of his church has been built up. The first year of his service at the Hampden church one hundred members were received, a new church has been built to take care of every department of the Sunday School and church work.

The young pople greatly admire Dr. Stone for his helpfulness and the interest he takes in them, in his own church and in the Young Peoples Summer Conferences.

We believe that Dr. Stone will be a great inspiration to the Convention and the President and his council have done well to secure the services of Dr. Stone.

JUDGE ENDICOTT OPPOSED TO BILL

Wm. P. Endicott, judge of the DeKalb-Steuben circuit, went on record Saturday as opposed to the bill introduced in the Indiana general assembly to give DeKalb county a separate court.

Judge Endicott dos not see that any good purpose would be served the two counties now comprising this circuit. He states that the time given under the law to each county for sessions of the court are sufficient to care for all the work. DeKalb county now has thirty-five weeks of court during the year and Steuben county seventeen weeks.

The bill pending was introduced in the senate by Senator Orin Markle of Elkhart, and provides that Elkhart and DeKalb counties should each comprise a circuit and LaGrange and Steuben counties should be combined for a new circuit. If the bill passes the Senate it will go the House, where it will first be referred to the committee on the courts, of which Representative Russell R. Ridenour DeKalb county is chairman.

NEWVILLE TOWNSHIP PETITIONS CONGRESSMAN

Washington, D. C, January 18th. A large number of soldiers and widows of Newville township have presented Congressman David Hogg a petition favoring the Elliott Pension Bill. Mr. Hogg has presented the petition to Congress and had it put on record.

Why Neglect Eyes?

Every other part of the body receives attention but, the eyes, though their importance is recognized, are neglected sometimes for a lifetime. And many folks who KNOW their eyes are defective very often let the matter run along for years wihout action. We don't believe they understand the seriousness of eye strain. 4-H GIRLS IMPROVING THEIR OWN ROOMS

Corner of Joy Gann's Bedroom, Showing Hangings She Made Herself.

(Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.)

In "Own Your Own Room" club girls learn how to plan a simple, attractive room, how to eliminate undesirable furnishings, how to select and arrange to best advantage what they already have, how to spend money wisely for new materials or furnishings, and how to care for their rooms. Very often it happens that when a girl has succeeded, with the help and advice of the extension agent, in making her own room attractive, the family becomes interested and soon the whole house is transformed.

The room shown in the illustration belongs to Joy Gann, a girl living on a farm in Albemarle county, Va. She started by filling up the holes in her walls and floor, with putty or plaster of paris. Then she painted the walls and varnished the floor. She undertook to make over the dilapidated fireplace, replacing broken bricks at the back and making a new cement hearth with a very little assistance from her brother. She renovated the old-fashioned furniture of the room, and made cretonne curtains in brown and orange to harmonize with the sunset tint of her walls. She replaced a broken frame of glass, made three rag rugs, and a counterpane of unbleached muslin for her bed. This she embroidered in black and orange. Many other little touches completed a very comfortable and charming room which is the admiration of all Joy's young friends.

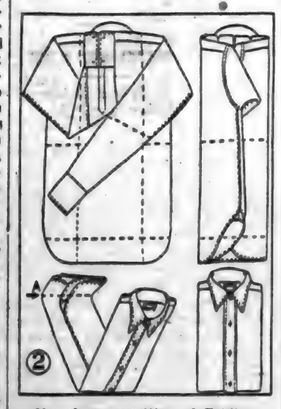
PARTICULAR WAYS TO FOLD A SHIRT

When Correctly Done Garment Retains Smoothness.

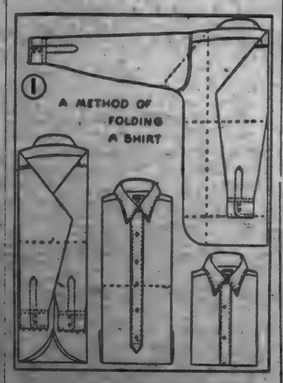
Do you know how to fold up a shirt after you have ironed it? When correctly folded the shirt will retain its smooth, trim appearance after being put away with others in a drawer or on a shelf, and it can be packed for travel with equal certainty that when taken out it will be fresh looking. Waists and dresses that are simply made can be folded in much the same way, but a better plan is to put them on hangers as soon as they are ironed, and store them in a closet that has a central pole for the purpose. All articles should be folded as little as possible, but this depends, of course, on the space available for storing them. In general, fold pieces lengthwise in the direction of the warp and then very lightly crosswise until a convenient size is reached.

To fold a shirt or blouse, button it down the front and then lay it front side down on a table or board, making sure there are no wrinkles. This is illustrated in diagram 1, which is from Farmers' Bulletin 1497, "Home Laundering," issued by the United States Department of Agriculture. The first folds are then made lengthwise, in such a way that the whole center front for about five inches each side of the middle will be kept smooth. The sleeves, by means of diagonal folds, are brought straight down the back lengthwise. Parts of the two sleeves will overlap. In the case of a shirt there will be an end or "tail" beyond the sleeves. This is turned back over the cuffs, and the shirt is folded across once more, leaving the front on the outside. A little practice soon makes one adept at folding shirts so that they will all be the same size when finished and fit in the same drawer or box. Laundries usually lay an oblong of cardboard of the desired width down the back before folding is begun, and fit the folds over that. If a few of these laundry cardboards are saved the home laundress can do the same thing. This extra protection from wrinkles is chiefly desirable if shirts are to be packed for traveling.

Manufacturers have a slightly different way of folding shirts, and some laundries use it. It is shown in diagram 2. Two diagonal folds are made in each sleeve, bringing the cuffs to the neck instead of straight down. They are usually pinned in place. The sides of the shirt are then turned in lengthwise, and the same two folds across are made as in the other method. The short fold is tucked between the upturned cuffs and the back of the shirt and pinned. This method makes a firm package for the retail merchant to handle, but the sleeves are more wrinkled when the shirt is opened up than when it has been folded the other way.



Manufacturers' Way of Folding.



Popular Way of Folding a Shirt.

Preparing Chocolate or Cocoa Is Not Difficult

Cocoa is easy to make. There are two points to keep in mind. In the first place, it lumps quite easily, and in the second, it should be boiled to thicken it and develop a somewhat better flavor. If the dry cocoa is combined with sugar, the sugar separates the particles and prevents lumping. To this may be added a small amount of water or milk. Heat to boiling until it thickens, boiling two or three minutes. Then add all remainder of the milk and heat to serving temperature.

Chocolate may be prepared in the same way, melting the amount of chocolate required in a small amount of water or milk, with the added sugar. It is not necessary to grate the chocolate. When this is cooked smooth, add the remainder of the liquid.

Determine What Colors Are Becoming for Dress

To determine what colors are most becoming, drape materials of various colors and textures about the shoulders while standing before a mirror in bright daylight. If the dress is to be worn in the evening, artificial light should be used. As each color is tried, study the effect it has on the color of your eyes, your hair and your skin. If your skin tends to be sallow, you will notice that lavenders and purples make it appear more sallow and that shades of rose and reds are somewhat more becoming because some of the color is reflected in the skin. Some of the greens, especially blue greens, will bring out its complement, red, that is in the skin. Colors may also be chosen that will emphasize the beauty of the hair and the eyes.

Keep in Trim!

Good Elimination Is Essential to Good Health.

THE kidneys are the blood filters. If they fail to function properly there is apt to be a retention of toxic poisons in the blood. A dull, languid feeling and, sometimes, toxic backaches, headaches, and dizziness are symptoms of this condition. Further evidence of improper kidney function is often found in burning or scanty passage of secretions. Each year more and more people are learning the value of Doan's Pills, a stimulant diuretic, in this condition. Scarcely a nook or hamlet anywhere but has many enthusiastic users. Ask your neighbor.

The Man With Three Names

—7—

"If you deceive her, and she finds it out, you will lose her."

But the truth must be kept from her. She must never know that her father was not the demigod she painted him. Of such is the miracle of love.

As for Betty, she felt herself confronted by a singular fact. She was being covertly snubbed: Nancy was snubbing her, the doctor was snubbing her, and others, too. Possessing a healthy pride, Betty dropped the idea of finding out what she craved to know. But she could not dismiss that remarkable pair from her thoughts. Again and again there came an almost irresistible longing to drive into that quiet street, stop at that door and ask for music.

It is supposable that one of the main reasons for the continuance of this odd situation was that Betty was lonely. Her hours were frequently crowded with action; still she was lonely for the companionships such as she had known in France.

Mansfield still kept three or four saddle horses, and frequently now they rode into the country in the early morning. He would never forget one brilliant, frosty morning. They had dismounted at the top of the hill where she had met Cathewe. The brown earth and the rusty boscage and the flashing blue water of the lake evoked in her desire to sing.

When the last glorious note died away, Mansfield asked in an uncertain voice: "What was that?"

"The Swallow.'"

"What made you want to sing like that?"

"All this"—with a gesture. "To see grandly is to feel grandly! I love to be up high, to see far horizons. I am wild, daddy; they never tamed me."

Immediately an odd thing happened to her mentally. Out of the sunshine and the frosty mists came a clear picture. She saw that beautiful mother, her white hair and her serene face touched magically by candlelight; she heard divine music. She became afire with the craving to hear it again. A most bizarre resolve laid hold of her. Everything in her—breeding, teaching, tradition—demanded that she dismiss this resolve. Nancy nor her father wanted Betty Mansfield to know that mother and son. The doctor would not have evaded her query without a good reason. And yet, they belonged to that class of intellectuals from which she herself had received her training.

"Mother, this is Miss Mansfield," he had said; but he had not added: "My name is so-and-so."

In her world, persons who preferred to remain unknown acted thus for significant reasons; they did not care to know you or be known. But against this was their charming hospitality. Had they been everyday Bannister folks, she would have passed on and forgotten. The unwritten law of her kind forbade Betty to cross that threshold again. And she was going to cross it that very afternoon.

She knew that the name of the editor of the Herald was Brandon Cathewe, but beyond that, nothing.

"I am ready," she said to her father suddenly.

She gathered up the reins and swung herself into the saddle. Mansfield followed, rather startled at the abruptness.

At half after two that afternoon Betty opened the gate and hurried up to the door of the house with the white clapboards. This haste was an exigency of fear, fear that if she hesitated or looked back, she would not dare go on with the mad adventure. She rang the bell and waited.

The instant the maid recognized Betty, she drew the door full-wide. One did not forget Betty overnight.

"I veel announce Ma'm'selle . . ." began the maid in broken English.

Betty entered the living-room and sat down on the lounge. Her heart wasn't quite right; it refused to behave. In fact, it was thumping in a most disloyal fashion.

Footsteps on the stairs. Betty stood up just as the subject of many diverse cogitations entered the room. The hostess came forward with both hands outstretched, with a frankly amused smile on her lips.

"I know," she began at once. "You have come back for some music."

"I feel so ashamed! I don't know, but I believe you have hypnotized me. I wasn't invited to come again."

"Indeed you were," replied the musician.

"I was?"—delighted.

"Certainly," answered Mrs. Cathewe, going to the piano. She struck the opening bars of Mendelssohn's "Capriccio." She possessed that marvelous faculty of playing without apparently watching the keys. What a beautiful child it was! Poor sonny! With that remarkable insight to character which was his, he had read this girl aright the first time. She was desirable.

After playing several more selections, Mrs. Cathewe left the seat and knelt before the music case, a piece of beautiful Florentine marquetry. Presently she held up a sheet of music so that Betty could see the title. It was one of Wolf-Ferrarri's exquisite songs.

"Do you know that?"

"Why . . . why, yes!"

"Will you sing it for me?"

"I'll try to, if you'll play the accompaniment."

Her voice was naturally a little husky and uncertain at first, but after the third attempt she found herself calm and confident; and her sweet high soprano filled the room.

When she had finished, Mrs. Cathewe performed one of those acts which artistic souls alone have the courage to perform. She caught the girl in her arms and embraced her, and Betty was pleased, thrilled and astonished.

By now it was time to go, so Betty gracefully took her leave. Then she ran down the steps to the gate, which she sent behind her with a click. Mrs. Cathewe remained in the doorway until Betty reached the corner; then she closed the door, walked thoughtfully toward the study and entered it.

"You did not give the name, mother?" Cathewe said suddenly.

"She did not ask for it. I am very sorry for her, too. When she finds out who you are, there will be doubts. When the hour comes she will put her father on one side of the scales and you and me on the other."

"I'll see it through!"

"Is he so bad?"

"The man who opened my safe did so at the orders of Mansfield. From your description and the patrolman's frank dismay, I at once had my suspicions. I confirmed them. Now, this man's power is not based upon anything but habit, remarkable as that statement may seem. He could be overthrown by a turn of the hand.

"What Are You Going to Do About Cathewe?" Pursued Maddox.

And the reason this hand is never turned is a human reason: Human beings find it easier to be inefficient than to be efficient. A king will hang on to his crown no matter how bloody his feet may be. So it is with the American political boss.

"He owns property all over town, but only the fine buildings are recorded in his name. And I'm going to knock the crown from his head . . . and give up the girl I love. There's the bell."

It was Nancy. "Mother Cathewe, I've come to take you for a ride," she exclaimed.

"And Mother Cathewe will be delighted to go. I'll run up and change."

"I have a confession to make, Brandon," said Nancy suddenly. "A few days ago I came in to take your mother out, and while she was upstairs dressing I saw your study door open."

"You found out I was George Cottar?"

"Yes; I feel dreadful about it."

"Nonsense! It doesn't matter, or it won't matter, once I'm through this Mansfield fight. But I didn't miss anything."

"I took a rejected sheet out of the waste basket and carried it off."

"By the way, Nancy, have you got that sheet of manuscript with you?" he asked.

She gave it to him. He went into the study and returned shortly. Across the face of the manuscript he had written: "From George Cottar to Nancy Maddox, his friend."

"Thanks. What beautiful script you write!"

"That's because I'm fussy. When I cross out a word, I generally throw the sheet away. A scandalous waste of paper, but I can't help it. Here's that mother o' mine."

When she returned home, Nancy ran straight to her room, turned on the light, and got out that precious page of manuscript. "From George Cottar to Nancy Maddox, his friend." Having possessed a guilty conscience regarding the theft of the sheet, she had not dared scrutinize it heretofore. She had been ashamed to take it out of the drawer. But now she had a right. So she read the page through, and presently was struck by the curious method by which Cathewe concluded his sentences. A little cross, resembling an x. Now, what did that stir in her mind? A cross, resembling the little x. But the riddle remained unsolved.

That night a new phase of the drama unrolled. Cathewe was at his desk as usual, reading some proofs. The real estate reporter—truthfully, the cub, for the markets and real estate were his regular assignments, these jobs being the bill of fare of all cubs on provincial newspapers—came in rather breathlessly.

"Mr. Cathewe, I've stumbled on the rip-banginest yarn you ever heard tell on."

"What's happened?" asked Cathewe cordially. He did not hold to the tradition that to make a reporter out of a cub one had to scare him to death first.

"Well, I came to you because it concerns Mansfield."

"Ah!"

"Know those tenements and shacks down by his mills?"

"Yes. Supposed to be owned by Colvin, but in reality owned by Mr. Mansfield. Go on."

"And those unsavory apartments on Melville street?"

Cathewe nodded. "Also owned by Mansfield."

"Well, the sale of them was recorded with the clerk this afternoon."

"Who purchased them?"

"Miss Mansfield!"

CHAPTER VII

The Doctor Speaks.

Cathewe rocked in his swivel chair for a moment.

"Mr. White," he said frankly, "I don't want this repeated to a soul. This is a personal affair between Mansfield and his daughter."

"But the whole town will hear of it, selling property to his daughter through a dummy," protested the cub.

"No. It's a good story, but we can't use it." And with a pleasant nod he dismissed the disappointed cub.

Cathewe laid his pipe on his desk and crossed over to the window, from which he stared at the November stars. He wondered how Mansfield had failed to see how the town would interpret this equivocal sale of property. The ironmonger was disliked so heartily that folks would be only too happy to attribute the worst to him, that of mulcting his daughter of her personal fortune.

He began to feel sorry for Mansfield, for he saw what Mansfield was soon to lose. With a crystal soul like Betty's, love must have its foundation upon respect. Tear this away, and the whole edifice must topple.

At three o'clock that morning he stole up the path to the Maddox front door and pushed a letter through the slot. And the doctor read this remarkable letter while at the breakfast table:

". . . I honestly feel sorry for him. You go up to him and urge him to confess about this real estate transaction. Impress upon him that the town will interpret the deal as a desire on his part to absorb his daughter's fortune. Keep me out of it, of course. I could use this weapon with profound effect—if I were a first-rate scoundrel. Go to him as soon as you can."

Three days later Maddox showed Mansfield the letter, and said:

"There is a chance, if you tell her; there is none, if you don't. Murder will out. You've called this young chap a scoundrel. He is an honest man."

"John," the magnate answered, "the money Betty paid for that property goes back into it two-fold. On the day the last shingle goes on I intend to return to her her check. I simply couldn't tell her part of my income for years has been from those—those places."

"Well, what are you going to do about Cathewe?" pursued Maddox.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Insistence on Song Cost Hostess Money

New York makes the most of its eminent people. Invitations to lunch, dine and dance come by the scores to those who have acquired fame by facility at one of the arts, and in many cases they are the drawing cards of the ambitious hostess.

A noted singer recently was invited to join a small group at the home of a casual friend and she accepted. After dinner the hostess cooed, "Now you must sing for us."

"I'm so sorry," said the soprano with genuine regret, "but I begin a concert tour tomorrow, and I must not use my voice till then."

"Ah, but think of the disappointment to our friends here; they came because I assured them you would sing for us. Really, I insist."

"You insist?" asked the singer.

"Assuredly."

The artist sang two songs, and on the next day the hostess received a bill "for professional services—$1,000."

Slightly in Error

"Mother, what is this Lent that you folks have been talking so much about?" asked the small daughter of Episcopalian parents. There followed a lengthy dissertation on the subject, during which the child paid close attention. At the close of the discourse, when the mother was hoping she had instilled some beautiful thoughts in the young mind, her daughter smiled angelically and said:

"Oh, so that's it. And here I thought all the time that it was that stuff you find under the bed!"

SWAGGER MODE FOR COATS; EYE VEILS DECORATE HATS

The Belted Silhouette.

IN REGARD to the midseason or early spring coat, the belted silhouette is the swagger thing. Nothing in the way of a wrap quite so bespeaks an appearance of youth as does a slim trim sports model, styled after the manner of the one in this picture. The mannish worsted of which it is made has much to do with its smartness. Tan and brown-checked homespun lined with natural colored kasha is the fabric selection for this attractive late winter coat. The neat velvet collar and cuffs do not detract from its general air of simplicity. The little belt of tan calfskin gives it an intriguing style touch.

Belts, be they ever so narrow, to properly distinguish the coat must in every instance have some outstanding touch of novelty. It is really surprising how much of genuine style just a wee little belt will impart. Just now the spotted calfskin belt is the vogue. When accompanying a black-and-white tweed or homespun, if the belt be splotched in black and white, the ensemble is in every way indicative of the trend of the mode.

Just as effective is the narrow suede belt in bright green, red or blue, worn with a coat of neutral coloring. Gilded or silvered kid belts retain their popularity.

Here is something to keep in mind in regard to the newer coats: for them navy is forecast as a leading color. The dressier models will be intricately seamed, boast boleros and the military little upstanding collars. Enlivening touches of metal embroidery, as well as trimmings of scarlet and other bright cloths will add to their youthfulness. There will be a generous use of pin-tucking, braiding and fabric manipulation.

Beige coat models interworked with blended flat fur are the pride of the younger generation. So fascinatingly has spotted calfskin contributed to the mode's success its continued use is heralded for months to come.

Dine and dance hats have a mission to perform. They must picturesquely play up to the dressiness of the occasion. Such a challenge calls for all that is loveliest and most aesthetic, gold and silver lace, to be explicit, filmy malines, rich fabrics and glittering ornaments. Glorify these with the art of the milliner, and the result will be just such charming confections as are grouped in the picture herewith.

Something very interesting has happened this season in the realm of millinery, this being none other than the revival of the coquettish and flirtatious eyebrow veil or curtain of malines. Two of the dainty hats in this collection show this becoming feature. The malines flare cuff is also as popular as ever, such as is shown in the picture at the top to the left. In fact malines plays a very important part in the creation of the evening hat. In brown tones especially it harmonizes with the gold metal laces and its softening influence is recognized by the designer.

The exotic evening chapeau in the center of this group reveals a unique malines frill which encircles the cap-like chapeau like a transparent brim. Close fitting caps, styled as is this one of satin and metal lace, are very fashionable for evening wear.

Gold and silver metal mesh lace in fine and delicate patterns has proven very adaptable to millinery purposes. Sometimes it is draped as in the case of the lovely little hat above to the right. Then again the lace is stretched over a satin formation, as instanced in the tall crowned model which concludes this collection of chapeaux typifying the evening mode.

One of the novel uses of metal lace is to cut away some of its background, pasting the patterned part on satin.

Drink Water If Back or Kidneys Hurt

Begin Taking Salts If You Feel Backachy or Have Bladder Weakness

Too much rich food forms acids which excite and overwork the kidneys in their efforts to filter it from the system. Flush the kidneys occasionally to relieve them like you relieve the bowels, removing acids, waste and poison, else you may feel a dull misery in the kidney region, sharp pains in the back or sick headache, dizziness, the stomach sours, tongue is coated, and when the weather is bad you have rheumatic twinges. The urine is cloudy, full of sediment, the channels often get irritated, obliging one to get up two or three times during the night.

To help neutralize these irritating acids and flush off the body's urinous waste, begin drinking water. Also get about four ounces of Jad Salts from any pharmacy, take a tablespoonful in a glass of water before breakfast for a few days and your kidneys may then act fine and bladder disorders disappear.

This famous salts is made from the acid of grapes and lemon juice, combined with lithia, and has been used for years to help clean and stimulate sluggish kidneys and stop bladder irritation. Jad Salts is inexpensive and makes a delightful effervescent lithia-water drink which millions of men and women take now and then to help prevent serious kidney and bladder disorders. By all means, drink lots of good water every day.

The Two Sides

Rev. Henry Darlington of New York, whose congregation is about to build a $2,000,000 church that will be a perfect example of Gothic architecture, said at a recent reception:

"In our theater there is too much licentiousness. Our post-war drama is worse than the old 'Restoration' drama. This is bad, very bad, for the morals of the young."

But a man with long hair objected:

"The young might answer, Doctor Darlington, that there are two sides to every question."

"Yes," said Doctor Darlington, "and there are two sides to every sheet of fly-paper, but it makes considerable difference to the fly which side he chooses."

A QUICKER WAY TO END COLDS

To quickly break up a cough or cold it is necessary to do two things:
1—Get rid of phlegm. 2—Heal irritation in lining of throat, chest and bronchial tubes.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral accomplishes this by its powerful double action. It cuts away phlegm because its medication penetrates through and through the linings of throat, chest and bronchial tubes. You feel almost instant relief, all the way down. Then it is absorbed into the irritated membranes just as ink soaks into a blotter. And its soothing, healing properties are absorbed by the membranes themselves, it stops the cough, breaks up the cold and brings prompt, lasting relief.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is hospital proved. Prescribed by physicians. Pleasant to taste. 60c and, twice the quantity, $1.00, at all druggists.

The snow and ice blanket covering the ground stopped the making of sweet clover hay, which had continued in Defiance county later than ever before known. The seed sown in oats and wheat produced a good crop that couldn't be harvested because of wet weather. During the past month the crop has been cut and the countryside has witnessed the strange spectacle of making hay in freezing weather.—Crescent News.

The Ginnivan Dramatic Company "Tent Theatre," which has made Ashley, Ind., its permanent headquarters for the past fifteen years, has been awarded the honor of being the oldest tent theatre repertoire show existing, according to the "Bill-Board," a theatrical paper which has been collecting the dates and records to determine the oldest and largest repertoire shows now existing. The Ginnivans are able to prove their years of existance by exact dates and photos kept by the family, consequently they have gained the honor of being the oldest and best established tent theatre existing today.

A Colorado preacher, who is also a justice of the peace, marries folks with two ceremonies, so that the knot will stay tied longer. What a field for that man in Hollywood!

We see a lot in the papers about women's dress— the lack of it, etc. A saintly old codger from away up at Zion City wants to forbid the dear things appearing upon the streets in costumes about so high or so low, (of course you can't see where our hands are.) While we are long for decency and all such highbrow stuff, yet we are herewith serving notice on one and all, that we ain't a-goin' to fool with nobody's skirts or nothing. If the women want to dress so as to show their dimples, what's it to us? It's their dimples, besides we don't have to look at them—if we don't want to—and we don't unless some of them pass our way, If all the women in this place want to come down town in bathing suits, or without hem, let 'em come on. We'll slip into the basement while they are passing and there 'tend our own business as every gentleman ought to do, and stop meddlin' with things of no concern to the male sex.

SPENCERVILLE DEFEATS NEW HAVEN

Break Losing Streak by Trouncing Downstaters in Hard Tilt 19-15

Spencerville, Jan, 17.—Spencerville high school defeated New Haven high school in a fast and exciting game 19 to 15. Both teams were quite awhile in finding the basket and a large portion of the half was gone before Beams sank the ball for the first score. Spencerville netted the ball again before New Haven tied the score. Then the locals went on a scoring spree and led at the rest period 12-4.

New Haven came back stronger in the second half but was not able to overcome Spencerville's lead, which not cut to less than four points at anytime. The ability of Beams to score from long range and of Bowser to break through the New Haven defense for close up shots were factors in the locals victory. Bowser was high point man with seven points to his credit.

Spencerville will go to St. Joe next Saturday night to play the high school there.

MESSAGE TO FRANCE

With a musical "ping," Suzanne Lenglen's magic tennis racket sent a white sphere whirling into the air at Palo Verde estates near Los Angeles. The ball was snared by Jimmie James, air mail flyer, who immediately nosed his plane into the eastern skies and nodded an acknowledgment of the farewell wave of the great French net star. Written on the ball, which ultimately will arrive at the desk of the President of France, was a New Year's greeting to the French people and their chief executive, written in the characteristic impetuous hand of Mlle. Lenglen.

DAIRY FACTS

FROZEN MILK IS NOT DESIRABLE

How is cow's milk injured by freezing? In answer to that question F. C. Button, professor of dairying at the New Jersey State College of Agriculture, says:

"Even a casual observer is familiar with the visible effects that freezing has on milk. He can see that the cream in thawed milk is not the same as in normal milk. He also knows that the main portion of the milk becomes flaky when thawed. These are the physical changes which milk undergoes upon freezing. The fat is partially churned and its emulsion is never completely restored after thawing. The casein or curd in frozen milk appears in flakes rather than in the original colloidal condition.

"Freezing also affects milk in a chemical way. The interference with fat emulsion makes frozen milk harder to digest than unfrozen milk. For this reason infants should not be fed milk which has been frozen.

"When milk becomes completely frozen, it is forced out of the bottle and lifts the cap. The milk may project as much as three or four inches. In this way it may become contaminated with bacteria from blowing dust and from being licked by dogs and cats. Milk which has been frozen will not keep sweet as long as normal milk.

"Where milk is delivered in the early morning hours, the consumer should provide some protection for the bottles. A box serves very well, and a burlap covering helps more in the extremely cold weather. The ideal arrangement would be to provide some place inside where the milkman could set the milk."

Should Cows Face in or to the Walls of Stable?

The old question of whether cows should face toward the center or toward the walls of a dairy barn is not settled by the New York State College of Agriculture, which says that both plans have their ardent supporters. It lists the advantages of each, and leaves the individual farmer to make his own choice.

The question arises, as far as the college is concerned, in connection with a new bulletin on the construction of concrete floors for dairy stables. It advocates well-laid floors for permanence and durability, and gives complete details for laying them, telling how to mix, lay and finish the concrete, with photographs and working drawings of the whole job, from start to completion, so that any handy man should not have trouble in getting a satisfactory result, and without prohibitive cost.

Farmers who are contemplating the building of new stables or the remodeling of old ones, are invited by the college to write to the office of publication of the New York State College of Agriculture at Ithaca for a copy of the bulletin which will be sent without cost. It is necessary only to use a plain 1-cent government postcard, giving the sender's name and address, written plainly, together with the symbol E 140, and the publication will be forwarded by return mail.

Attention to Give Cows Afflicted With Garget

Watch out for garget in a new milk cow these cold days. At the first sign of a swollen udder or stringiness in the milk, cut down the animal's grain ration until she is relieved, and give her a dose of physic—castor oil or epsom salts. Milk her gently several times a day, also kneading the udder with your hands, and keep the animal in a warm place. After the physic has worked an ounce of saltpeter daily for two or three days is helpful. So, too, are hot cloths applied to the udder for a few minutes every two or three hours—taking care that the udder does not afterward become chilled.

Cows Mean More Profits in Diversified Farming

How is dairying going to make diversified farming more profitable?

Diversified farming means the growing of larger areas in grain crops, legumes and other hay and forage crops. If these are sold directly from the farm large amounts of soil fertility will be carried away in these crops. By feeding these crops to dairy cattle at home and thus retaining most of their fertility on the farm for soil building, the farmer gets a profit in growing the crop and another in feeding it.—Clemson College News Notes.

Barley for Fattening

Barley proved to be worth slightly more than corn for fattening calves at a test recently completed at the Colorado experiment station. The rate of gain for the corn and barley fattened calves was practically the same. The two lots under comparison were fed corn silage, linseed cake and alfalfa hay in addition to the grain ration. There was a considerable saving in alfalfa hay with the barley-fed calves. The calves fed barley outsold those fed corn.

Lesson for January 23

PRAYER IN CHRISTIAN LIFE

LESSON TEXT—Mark 1:35; 14:32-42; Matt. 6:9-13.

GOLDEN TEXT—Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you.

PRIMARY TOPIC—Talking to God.

JUNIOR TOPIC—Jesus Teaches Us How to Pray.

INTERMEDIATE AND SENIOR TOPIC—Learning From Jesus How to Pray.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULT TOPIC—What Jesus Taught by Prayer.

I. Jesus Praying in a Solitary Place (Mark 1:35).

After a series of most strenuous efforts Jesus retired to a lonely place to pray. He who the day before had shown His mighty power in casting out devils and banishing disease now needed to be alone with God. In order to do this He arose a long time before daylight. The very best time to pray is in the morning when our physical powers have been renewed. If the Son of God needed this time for prayer, this renewal of spiritual strength in communion with the Heavenly Father, how much more should we seek help by retiring to the solitary place.

II. Jesus Praying in Gethsemane (Mark 14:32-42)

In this time of crisis He took with him Peter, James and John.

1. The first prayer (vv. 35-38).

(1) His posture (v. 35).

He fell on his face prostrate on the ground. In the hour of great need we naturally prostrate ourselves before God.

(2) His petition (v. 36).

"Take away this cup from me." By the cup is meant His death on the cross. No doubt it was most grievous for Him to face this shame, but He pressed on, knowing that for this cause He had come into the world (John 12:27, 28, cf. Heb. 2:14).

(3) His resignation (v. 36).

His will was in subjection to the Father. He knew that His death on the cross was the will of God, the Father, for He was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.

(4) The disciples rebuked (v. 37).

He singled out Peter since he had been the most conspicuous in proclaiming his loyalty (John 13:38).

(5) Extortation to the disciples (v. 38).

"Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation." The only way to be able to stand in the time of trial is to be watching and praying.

2. The second prayer (vv. 39, 40).

He withdrew the second time from the disciples and uttered the same words in prayer. This was not vain repetition. It is proper to repeat our requests. He found the disciples asleep again. Their shame and confusion were more marked than at first.

3. The third prayer (vv. 41, 42).

He uttered the same words in the third prayer (Matt. 26:44).

He tells the disciples to sleep on and take their rest as the hour had now come for His betrayal. There is such a thing as being asleep when wanted and awakening when it is too late. If the disciples had been praying they would not have fallen asleep.

III. Jesus Giving a Model Prayer (Matt. 6:9-13).

This model was given in response to the disciples' request that the Lord would teach them how to pray (Luke 11:10). It is not therefore the Lord's prayer, but the model prayer for the disciples. It involves:

1. A right relationship (v. 9).

"Our Father." Only those who become children of God by faith in Jesus Christ (Gal. 3:26) can pray aright. One must be a child of God before he can be in communion with God.

2. A right attitude (vv. 9, 10).

"Hallowed be Thy name." When one realizes that he has been delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the kingdom of His Son (Col. 1:13) by being made a child of God, he cannot help pouring out his soul in gratitude and praise, intensely longing for the kingdom, the righteous rule of Christ to come on the earth.

3. A right spirit (vv. 11-13).

(1) That of trust which looks to God for the supply of daily bread. We are dependent upon Him for our daily food. With all man's boasted progress he cannot make a harvest. The marvels of modern chemistry are insufficient for this.

(2) That of love which results in forgiveness of others. God will not listen to the prayer of one who has an unforgiving spirit.

(3) That of holiness which moves one to pray not to be led into temptation and longs to be delivered from the evil one.

"Soiled" Language

The language of some men is so "soiled" that it seems a proof that they were formed of the soil.—King's Business.

IT WAS THE PROFESSOR'S SCHEME

By FENTON BRIGHT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman.)

"WHY don't I go to work, boss? Because there ain't no human being what will give me work. You wouldn't believe me if I was to tell you that I'm a Yale graduate, and that my folks was as white as the driveh snow, would you? Say, make it a dollar and I'll tell you my story.

"Thanks, boss. Well, then, my name's Theodore Van Trump, and I belong to one of the best families of Boston. And when I fell into love with Marian Richards there wasn't a happier man this side of the Common. The only fly in the ointment was Jim Burley, my rival. He wasn't a college man like me, but he had the rocks, and I hadn't.

"She couldn't decide which one of us she'd take. 'I love you both,' she said. 'I love you both equal. If I've got to decide I'll die an old maid. Can't one of you boys make me take you?'

"'That suits me,' says Jim. 'Same here,' I allowed. 'But how are we going to do it?' asks Jim. 'Let's fight for it,' says I. 'Right,' answers Jim, and we set to that night.

"It was a closed and locked empty room, and the key was put on the floor before the door, and the one that first grabbed it meant 'I've had enough.' A sanguinary battle it was, gentlemen. We fought thirty-seven rounds by daylight and eighteen more by candlelight. And when it was over neither of us would have recognised the other. But neither of us grabbed the key.

"'I guess that won't do,' panted Jim, as he looked at me out of the corner of his mouth from the floor. 'Same here,' I answered, out of my forehead. You see our features had become displaced, gentlemen. 'Let's grab the key together,' Jim suggests. 'That suits me,' I answered. And so we did.

"Jim challenged me to a duel. We went into the woods and shot at each other at ten paces, then five, then three. We drilled each other like sieves, but we couldn't kill each other. 'This won't do, either,' says Jim to me as we lay side by side in the hospital ward. 'I agree,' says I. 'Make it another dollar, gentlemen? No? All right, suit yourselves, then.

"Well, sir, we tried all ways, including going up in bursting balloons and eloping with Marian. Neither of us could bring it off. When Jim had Marian half way to the altar I butted in and forbade the banns. When I got Marian down a rope ladder, Jim was waiting below with an ax to chop the rope before I reached the ground. And all the time Marian would have taken either of us; didn't care which, in fact, so long as it wasn't anybody else.

"Jim comes to me one day. 'I got it,' he says. 'Got what?' asks I. 'It,' says Jim, displaying a vial. 'This was given to me by Professor MacStart,' he says, 'and it's going to solve our problem. Let's go to Marian's house and we'll all talk it over together.'

"When we got there Marian welcomed us like kings. 'Have you decided which of you it's to be?' she asks. 'I'm sort of getting tired of waiting, and it's only fair to tell you that there's a third party just butted in. Not that I care for him as I do you boys, but I can't wait for you forever.'

"'That's all right,' says Jim. 'My friend Perfessor MacStart has agreed to help us out of our difficulties. It's a duel,' he says.

"'Not for me,' says I. 'I've fought you enough duels, Jim, and you know we're so evenly matched that neither of us could best the other, not even in a spelling bee.'

"'This is different,' says Jim. 'I have here a vial. It contains two doses of stuff. Inside one of these doses is a single drop of Perfessor MacStart's famous mixture for turning white people black.'

"'I never heard of such a thing,' says Marian. 'Who wants to turn white people black?'

"'That's just the point; nobody does usually,' says Jim. 'However, this is a case in point. This single drop of Perfessor MacStart's famous mixture won't mix. It's just a drop, floating in the center of the bottle. It can't be seen, heard, smelled, touched, or tasted. Now, if we divide the contents of this here vial, one of us must get the drop and one won't. It can't be divided. It's an original molecoddleole.'

"'I'm beginning to get you now,' says I. 'The winner is the one what turns black, and he gets Miss Marian.'

"'Never!' screamed Marian. 'I'm going to marry the loser. No black fellows for mine.'

"'The winner is the loser,' explains Jim Burley. 'In six to eight hours the winning loser, what was white, turns completely black, for keeps. The loser is the winner. He marries Miss Marian.'

"'Not before I've had time to see he doesn't turn black, too,' says Marian.

"'He won't,' says Jim, patientlike. 'You see, he won't swallow the drop, and he began to uncork the vial. 'Are you ready, Theodore?' he asks.

"'Entirely so,' says I. 'You see, I loved the girl well enough to be willing to turn black if I couldn't have her.

"'Then come on,' says Jim, pouring out the stuff into two glasses. How they happened to be there ought to have puzzled me at the time, but it didn't. 'I think I've divided fair,' says Jim, 'and you can take whichever glass you want.'

"'I'll take the one nearest you,' says I. 'Here's health, anyhow.' And so we drank. 'You won't make it another dollar, gentlemen? All right; just as you please, of course.'

"We went home. All that night I kept feeling myself to see if I was black, but I felt just the same. I guessed I'd won then and went to sleep peaceful. When I woke in the morning I went over to my shaving mirror. I was as black as the ace of spades, gentlemen. And it wouldn't wash off.

"Well, sir, you can guess how I felt. Jim Burley had got her for sure. What riled me more than anything else was my having took the glass nearest him. If I'd taken the other one I'd have been white instead of black. Now I was black instead of white. I tell you, gentlemen, it made me sick.

"I thought of all the trouble I'd had, getting my face bunged up by Jim, and then drilled full of holes, and falling nine hundred feet out of a blazing balloon, just as if I'd been a 'movie' actor instead of an ordinary decent, self-respecting citizen, and it got me sore.

"I had a try at salves and turpentine, but it seemed to have settled too deep for anything to be of much use. I thought of telephoning Marian to take me anyhow, but I knew that wouldn't go. Jim had won her in fair fight, and—well, I had to knuckle under.

"Just then I heard a ring at the door of my apartment. I went and opened it. An ugly-looking buck nigger was standing there.

"'What do you want, you black loafer?' I roared, for I wasn't feeling very kindly toward the colored race just then. He looks to me— 'What, you too?' he roars. And then I saw that it was Jim.

"'Come in!' I says, frostily, but still glad at heart. But he didn't need the invitation, but just pushed me into my room and pulled the door to after him. And he burst into a roar of laughter.

"'I don't see nothing funny in your remarks,' says I. But Jim only laughs the louder. 'Have you tried turpentine?' he asks.

"'I have, and likewise suds, benzine and gasoline,' I answers, huffily. Then the laughing fit took hold of me as well. 'Say, Jim, you do look like a peach,' I says. 'Do you think Miss Marian will marry you now?'

"'That drop must have divided,' says Jim. 'Well, there's no hope for either of us now, Theodora.'

"'I dunno,' says I. 'I guess it's up to us to commit suicide, if we ain't death-proof, but there's one thing to do first, and that's to bash up Perfessor MacStart.'

"'I'm with you there,' I says. 'When do we begin?'

"'Right now,' he says; and then the telephone rang. 'Excuse me,' says I.

"'I'll go with you,' says Jim, kind of suspicious.

"It was from Marian. 'Congratulate me, boys,' she says. 'I guess you're together. I'm telephoning you from Atlantic City. The perfesser and I were married at six this morning.'

"I don't know that I need to say any more, gentlemen. I've been searching for the perfesser ever since, but I've never found him. In the intervals I've been searching for something to take the color off. I never found that either. Jim and I at last started to work our way through the states to find MacStart. He started from San Francisco and I from New York. I don't know how far he's got, but I've reached Jersey City, as you see, and I hope to make Philadelphia by the end of the year. You don't think it's worth another dollar to help me on my way after my telling you this? Oh, all right, suit yourselves, gentlemen."

Find Intense Cold Over Equatorial Sea

The French meteorologist Teisserenc de Bort gives a remarkable record of temperature observed by means of aeronautical researches in the upper air over the equatorial regions of the Atlantic. Good results were obtained by an expedition by himself and Mrs. Rotch in these regions, and, contrary to expectations, it was found that at high levels in the equatorial air much lower temperatures were recorded than at corresponding heights in the temperate latitudes. Over the equator the isothermal zone seemed to be absent. But the temperature continued to decrease up to the highest point reached, and at altitudes of eight miles or more it was found as low as 112 degrees below zero of Fahrenheit's scale.

This intense cold in the high air over the equatorial Atlantic, on which the sun exerts greatest heating power, seems mysterious, indeed, though there is no reason whatever to question the accuracy of the recording instruments. Its explanation is, perhaps, to be found in the existence of a broad atmospheric current traveling with enormous velocity from east to west at altitudes from five to eight miles above the equatorial regions and apparently circling the globe. It seems probable that on surfaces of such a current, from which masses of air have been violently separated as lateral offshoots, the resulting sudden diminution of pressure and expansion of the air would account for an immense reduction of the temperature below zero.

FRENCH COOKING

There is much to be said for starting at least one meal a day with a good hot nourishing soup. The following are a few culled from French cuisine:

Chestnut Soup.—Put into a saucepan a cupful of shelled chestnuts Cook on a slow fire without boiling for half an hour, then remove the brown skin. Put the chestnuts into a mortar with a slice of dry bread and pound to a paste, adding a little bouillon to soften the bread from time to time. Pass through a strainer, add bouillon and cook for another half hour. Serve with croutons.

Onion Soup.—Peel six large onions, cut into thin slices. Cook lightly in butter. When partially browned add a tablespoonful of flour and continue cooking until the mixture is brown. Add water, salt and pepper and cook for a half hour or until the onions are tender. Strain if desired and serve on toast with grated cheese.

Chicken Bouillon.—Take a pound of stewing meat, and an old rooster or lean pullet, cut into small pieces, cover with cold water and simmer; when it has begun to simmer add seasoning—an onion stuck with cloves, a few herbs and carrots and turnips cut into bits. Cook until the meat is very tender. Drain and serve.

Food for the Family.

For those who like the filling but do not eat pastry try the filling in cups.

Pumpkin Pie in Cups.—Put a rim of pastry around custard cups after filling them with pumpkin pulp and bake as usual.

Cranberry Ice.—Cook cranberries as for sauce and strain them; add an equal amount of sugar sirup and freeze. Make the sirup by boiling two cupfuls of sugar with one-half cupful of water. Cool and add to the juice. Freeze and serve in cups.

Turkey Giblet Soup.—Chop the cooked giblets fine, then put through a coarse sieve. Thicken the liquor in which the giblets were cooked with a little butter and flour cooked together, then add cream to the giblets and brown stock to make the quantity desired.

Chestnut Stuffing.—Blanch a pound of Italian chestnuts, boil until tender and put through the ricer. Add one cupful of bread crumbs, one-half cupful of shortening, one tablespoonful of poultry seasoning, a half cupful of raisins, salt, celery, pepper and cayenne to taste.

Cabbage Salad.—Shred a firm white head of cabbage and dress with cream, add a dash of vinegar and sugar to taste with a bit of salt.

Eggs Marchesa.—Butter muffin tins and set upon the stove to warm. In the bottom of each put a teaspoonful of soft bread crumbs, add a dessert spoonful of milk, then a fresh egg carefully broken, season with salt, paprika and pepper. Over this drop a lump of butter, more bread crumbs and a little grated cheese. Bake in a moderate oven for ten minutes. They should be a golden brown and when a knife is run around the edge and they are turned out on a hot platter, they look like brown puff balls.

A hot egg sandwich is most appetizing for a quick lunch. Fry a little onion in butter until the onion is light yellow, then drop in an egg. Cook until done, put onto a piece of hot buttered bread, cover with another and serve.

Rochester Jelly Cake.—Cream two-thirds of a cupful of butter, add two cupfuls of sugar, one cupful of milk, and three cupfuls of flour and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Beat well, and to one-third of the batter add one tablespoonful of molasses, one cupful of chopped raisins dusted with one tablespoonful of flour, one-fourth pound of sliced citron, one-half teaspoonful each of nutmeg and allspice, and two teaspoonfuls of cinnamon. Bake the plain batter in two layers and the spiced fruit batter in one, placing the fruit layer between the two plain layers and put together with jelly or marmalade.

FIRST GAME ON LOCAL GYM FLOOR

The new High School and Community Gymnasium was formally opened to the public last Friday night, when the local High School Boys and Girls Basketball teams met the Boys and Girls teams of Mark Center High School.

A large crowd, including many people from Mark Center, Ohio, were in attendance.

In the first game of the evening, our High School Girls played the girls of Mark Center High and were defeated by a large score. However, our girls played a good game, considering, that this is their first season.

In the second game the Boys team was defeated by Mark Center, also. Our High School team is playing its first season and is showing good form and improvement.

The Girls and Boys teams of Mark Center are unusually strong. They were champions of Defiance county last year.

The Gymnasium was a source of interest to the spectators. It has a broad entrance balcony, which steps down on both sides into the auditorium and basketball court. A large stage with footlights is in the west end of the building. The basketball court is composed of a hardwood floor and is regulation size. The space or either side of the court will accommodate a large number of spectators. A shower bath room and two dressing rooms are under the stage.

This new school building is a distinct asset to Concord Township, St. Joe and the community.

LODGE NOTES

The international extension program announced recently by officers of the Supreme (Lodge Knights of Pythias, will, in a large measure, direct the activities of St. Joe Lodge, No. 400, according to Chancellor Commander Harvey Hull, who was recently installed with eight other officers of the lodge to direct the work of the Pythian fraternity in this city during the year. The program, includes among other activities a definite plan to increase the social features, quicken interest in communtiy service and to make a stronger appeal to worthy citizens to become members of the Order. The lodge has set as a mark in the increase of its membership under the general plan announced by the Supreme Lodge to secure a twenty per cent net gain during the year.

Commenting on the outline for the new year, Chancellor Commander Hull said: "The program is intended to make the lodge a real factor in the life of the community and to aid in the extension of the benefits of fraternal membership by performing its share in the great national movement. The movement is supported by nearly one million members in the United States and Canada. We have over 6,400 lodges and it is the purpose of the program of activity to make every one of these lodges the center of fraternal accomplishment in performing the service for which the fraternity was founded—to make better homes and better communities in which to live.

"The Pythian Order now operates eighteen homes for aged members, their widows and orphans. Five other states are building homes. Investment in this phase of Pythian endeavor amounts to more than $4,000,000 and over 2,000 men, women and children are provided with home comforts. Five grand domains have established educational trust funds by which worthy young men and women are given opportunity for advanced college training. Nearly two hundred are now being kept in colleges through loans from these funds.

"The Pythian Sisters, the woman's auxiliary of the Order has a membership of nearly a half million and distributes annually more than $250,000 for the care of orphaned children and for the comforts of the aged and poverty stricken.

"In every respect the financial condition of the Order is gratifying. The Subordinate Lodges distributed last year $1,709,000 for relief. The assets of Grand and Subordinate lodges is over $30,000,000, a gain of over $1,015,000 for the year, and in 1926 sixty-six lodges built their own homes costing more than $8,000,000. Our lodge in adopting this program will take definite steps to carry out the objectives of other lodges over the Supreme Domain."

The following officers were installed:

WHAT INTEREST DOES

Ever realize the importance of having money working at interest for you? Here is the way interest piles up.

It has been estimated that if the thirty pieces of silver which Judas got for betraying Christ, had been placed at 4% interest, assuming their value to be half a dollar each, today they would be a mass of the precious metal 345,000 times the size of the earth. It is all right to work for money, but to play the game big—get money to working for you.

CONFIDENCE IS WHAT COUNTS.

The St. Joe Valley Bank, A STATE BANK

BLOSSOM TIME AT SHRINE AUDITORIUM

"Blossom Time,"—The enchanting Franz Schubert operata, will be the attraction at the Shrine Auditorium matinee and night, Saturday, January 22nd., under the direction of the Messrs. Lee and J. J. Schubert. As every one knows this musical play has had one of the most remarkable triumphant runs of any play of its kind in the past century. This will mark the fifteenth and sixteenth engagement of "Blossom Time" in Fort Wayne and it is positively announced by the Schubert management that this will be the final and farewell tour.

"Blossom Time" is without a doubt the most successful musical offering the stage has ever known. No more wonderful strain of music has been heard than the graceful "Serenade" the sweet melody of the "Unfinished Symphony" and the entrancing "Ave Maria" which form the basis of this marvelous operetta.

The Messrs Shubert are sending to Fort Wayne an excellent singing and acting company, the same as was seen in New York last week among whom are Genevieve Naegele, William Danforth, John Charles Gilbert, Reginald Pasch, Fiamma Reale, Edward Douglas, Dorothy McKeon, Gloria Dawn, Mida Geenen, Millie Freeman, and many others and last, but not least, a sprightly and charming chorus of young girls. A special symphony orchestra is carried and the entire production is under the personel direction of Mr. J. J. Schubert,

William Danforth, Millie Freeman and several others mentioned above were members of the original "Blossom Time" company and will be remembered from the first engagement in Fort Wayne when the New York company played at the Majestic Theatre.

In conclusion, if you have seen "Blossom Time" before, you will want to see it again. If you have not, don't miss it this time—it's your last chance.

DOCTORS VOTE TO GIVE SCHICK TEST

DeKalb County to Co-operate With State Board of Health In Wiping Out Diphtheria

Meeting of the DeKalb County Medical association was held at the Hotel Auburn Friday night, members hearng an address by Raymond Bright, a deputy state health officer, on the immunization and prevention of contagious diseases. Diphtheria was especially stressed in Mr. Bright's address.

The physicians agreed to encourage and recommend the Schick test in DeKalb county for diphtheria. This test determines whether or not the child is susceptible to diphtheria. Four days after the test if a red spot appears on the child's arm at the spot where the needle entered, the child will take diphtheria if exposed.

After the test has been given then an injection of toxin-antitoxin may be given as a permanent preventative. Three shots are given, one each week for three consecutive weeks. It will take six months for the child to become thoroughly immunized. At the end of that time another Schick test is given to prove that the toxin-antitoxin has done the work. There need be no fear of the child ever contracting diphtheria after immunized.

The Schick tests will be given in the schools of DeKalb county at a cost of 50 cents each but under no circumstances unless the child presents a "consent card" from the parent.

DELINQUENT SALE ON FEBRUARY 7TH

Three Hundred and Forty-Three Parcels of Land in DeKalb County to be Offered at Auction

The annual tax sale will be held at the DeKalb county court house by County Auditor Estell Dawson and County Treasurer Ward Jackman on Monday, February 7, at 10 a. m.

The number of descriptions of real estate for which taxes are delinquent is 343, which is the largest number for some years. The legal notice last year contained 315. There were 265 in 1925, 196 in 1924 and 216 in 1923.

The list contains the lands and town and city lots returned delinquent for non-payment of taxes for the year 1925, payable in 1926, with interest and penalty added, as well as for the taxes of 1926 payable in 1927.

Garrett has 74 descriptions in the list, Auburn 40, Butler City 39, Union township 30, Altona 13, Butler and Keyser township each 12, Waterloo 11, Richland and Newville townships each 6, Jackson and Concord townships and St. Joe each 4, Fairfield township 2 and Ashley and Grant township each 1.

No delinquent tax is listed for Troy, Stafford, Franklin or Smithfield townships.

Besides the descriptions enumerated, there are 13 in Auburn, 26 in Garrett and 1 in Waterloo for non-payment of street paving assessments; 2 for the W. E. Swanders drain, 16 for the Don E. VanFleit drain, 9 for the E. H. Hansen drain, 2 for th J. J. Hampsire drain and 1 for a line fence in Fairfield township.

COUNTY AGENT QUITS DEFIANCE COUNTY

No increase will be made in the appropriation for the support of agricultural extension work of Ohio State university as sought last week by a delegation of farmers and Farm Bureau members, Defiance county commissioners announced Monday morning.

Each commissioner said he had reached this decision.

Because of the failure of the commissioners to provide $2,800 as asked for, extension work through a county agent will soon be a thing of the past in the county, from present appearances. Delegates who last week asked for the appropriation said the work could not continue unless the additional money was secured because the Farm Bureau is no longer financially able to help the movement.

BILL INTRODUCED TO REPEAL PRIMARY

Indianapolis, Jan. 18.—Repeal of the primary law in Indiana was proposed in the state legislature this afternoon by a measure introduced by Senator H. Lyle Shank, of DeKalb, Steuben and LaGrange counties and Senator O'Burke, representing Allen county.

Decided opposition to the primary has developed in many localities and it is expected that consideration of the measure will provide one of the hottest fights of the 1927 assembly.

Children under 16 years of age will be permitted to drive automobiles to school if they have written permits from their parents if a bill introduced by Senator J. Francis Lochard, Milan becomes a law.

VOL. XLI. ST. JOE, DeKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1927 NUMBER 4

Community High School and Gymnasium Dedication

The new High School and Gymnasium and Community Auditorium was formally dedicated to Concord Township and this community, last Thursday, January 20th.

A large crowd was in attendance during the day and evening. This magnificent building was a source of interest to each one present, combining as it does, the various features of a gymnasium and an auditorium.

The afternoon session comprised three basketball games between the selected teams of the community. The games were interesting and proved the excellence of the basketball court and the seating arrangement at the sides and ends.

After the final game, the Parent Teacher Association gave a lunch.

The formal dedicatory service started at 7:30 in the evening with Trustee Shull, as chairman of the program. The audience, led by Miss Gallahan, sang America, a recitation by Basil Sheffer followed, then a reading by M. R. White and a vocal solo by Kenneth Ryan.

Frank Milliman, former trustee, talked for a few minutes about the conception and place of the new building. The contract for the new building was given under the regime of Mr. Milliman and his advisory board, M. D. Engle, Ed Schrader and George Walter.

Wm. Curie, chairman of local committee of men, who insured the contract of the new building, by raising an amount necessary to complete the contract price for the building.

Mr. Curie, spoke briefly, paying tribute to Concord Township, including the tarpayers, the local committee, the former and present trustees and their respective advisory boards, and Mrs. Kate A. Leighty, who made a liberal donation to the building, and also gave a play ground for the children.

Mr. Curie, emphasizeed the fact that this school and community building, belongs to three generations, the older, the younger and the youthful and he expressed the wish and thought that each era would gain their pleasure and need of inspiration according to

Because of the inconvenience spective generations.

The next number of the programme, was a ladies quartette, composed of Mrs. Paul Curie, Mrs. F. B. Leighty, Mrs. H. M. Widney and Mrs. Roy Koch. They sang in good voice and pleased the audience.

Chairman Shull, then introduced the Rev. A. J. Folsom, Pastor of First Congregational Church of Fort Wayne, who made the principal address of the evening.

The Rev. Mr. Folsum, possesses a pleasing personality, and is, first of all, a gentleman.

These facts preclude the quality of his address. It is unnecessary to state that his remarks were inspirational and entirely in keeping with the dedicatory service. The Rev. Mr. Folsum stressed the fact, that the spirit of a community, determines the quality of its progress. He complimented the citizens upon their progressive endeavor, their ambitious program and the high quality of their spiritual impulses.

The formal dedication service was closed with, The National Anthem, sung by the entire audience.

Benefit Show

For five years St. Joe and community have been without a place in which to hold community meetings and plays, of which would command a large attendance, other than the high school room, until now when the new gym has finally been opened to the public.

The Home Dramatic Company put on the first benefit play last Friday evening, at which time the chair capacity was completely taken up.

"The Road to the City," was the title of the four act play, and it proved to be of equal high standard, as is the custom of the local players to put on. Each member of the cast was up to their usual fitness for the parts and the audience appreciated the humorous incidents.

Pople who have not been out of their homes all winter, were filled with a spirit of appreciation of the event and came to witness the play and to lend their support to the fund which made it possible to have 400 of the finest opera seats obtainable to be used in the seating of the gym.

A statement of the funds is as follows:

Door Rceipts	$106.90
Donations in Cash	3.10
Total Cash	$110.00
Expenses	10.55
Cash Balance	$ 99.45

Description of Building

The dimensions of this building, are outside, length of main building, 100x54 feet, this is exexclusive of boiler room. Main building is constructed of hard surfaced rough red western brick upon a cement foundation. Walls are stepped down at intervals to accommodate slope of roof. A tile coping finishes side walls, while the front presents a pleasing appearance, being broken up in a series of curves and angles, the whole being capped with gray sandstone. Windows of second story are of wood frame and sash, while for the gym, or lower story, steel sash are used. Pilasters of brick break up the monotony of what would otherwise be a plain wall. They serve the additional purpose as supports for massive I-beams which bear the weight of upper floors, which are of cement foundation together with steel lath. Upon this cement foundation is laid a maple floor in main school room, or auditorium, two class rooms and teachers study room. The main hall way, science room, two toilet rooms and portion of teachers study are all cement that of the toilet rooms being stained a tan shade. The roof of main building is built of three layers of heavy roofing paper, each layer laid singly and a coat of heated asphalt applied between and over last coat of paper, the last coat of paper being extra heavy ply.

Three large sky lights shed light directly over and into the main assembly room through beautiful art glass in ceiling. The ventilating system has an outlet above the roof. All ceilings except above stage in main building are of steel finished in a flat ivory or cream finish ceiling over boiler room is cement which answers as roof as well. The dimensions of the rooms on second story are as follows: Schoolroom 48x52; science room, 18x36; toilets, 9x18 respectively; class rooms, 19x18; principal's office, 9x18. An all metal and cement stairway 5x8 feet connects the lobby with rooms above, a landing being built at a point intermediate between turn of stairway. Treads of stairway are of cement. On each side of hallway, which is 12x53, is built a closet with an ingenious system of disappearing doors, this is for wraps of students.

The lobby, which you enter has a cement floor, at each end, steps lead downward to the gym floor. The partition wall which separates the lobby from the gym is perforated by openings, in which it was intended to place windows. This idea, however, was for some cause deemed unnecessary; instead, the openings are protected by heavy wire screens, as are all other windows of this room.

The foundation of the gym floor which measure 64x85 feet, is of cement, this when dry was covered with a heavy coat of asphalt. 2x4 pine was laid upon this upon which a sub floor of ship lap was nailed, this in turn was covered with tongued and grooved flooring of maple. A cement border 8 ft. 2 in. is placed on each side of the maple floor; this is for use of spectators of the game, and foundation upon which, at a later date perhaps bleachers may be constructed.

At the west end of the gym rises the stage, which is 52x14 feet dimension, with an opening of 30 feet and height of 14 feet.

A fine purple velour curtain hangs behind a valance, which in its center bears in gold color the initials C. T. H. S.

The building throughout is hot water heated, and electrically lighted. A system of ventilators is used in which fresh air is removed in all parts of school rooms. A fan located in attic, passes cold air through a steam radiator then through metal boxes or conducts to all upstairs rooms.

The installation of toilet fixtures has not been completed, this has been deferred to a later date, but provisions have been made to take care of this in due time.

This also applys to shower bath equipment as well. Shower bath rooms are under stage. There are two of these rooms, one for boys and one for girls.

These rooms will also be used for dressing rooms. Back of the stage is built the all cement boiler room, in which a modern type boiler is installed. This room has been built large with a view to the installation of another boiler, when the change is made in old building from a hot air to the steam system, which change will be made at some future time.

There is ample room for the storage of two car loads of coal, space for same being walled off in this room.

Woodwork is in golden oak finish, over pine, in main rooms above and about stage. Scenery has been installed for stage which consists of purple valance and front curtains, sliding type, one set woodland scenic back drop and wings to correspond, one set, combination reversible kitchen and parlor.

ST. JOE MEETS BUTLER IN COUNTY TOURNAMENT

The drawing for the county basketball tournament to be held at Spencerville January 28 and 29, took place at Auburn Saturday afternoon. Following is the schedule of games:

Friday Evening

COOLEY SALE (TODAY) THURSDAY

John Cooley, living 2 miles north and ¾ mile west of St. Joe, will have a sale today, selling 2 horses, 10 head of cattle, all of his farming machinery, besides corn in the crib.

THE PLACE TO BUY

Fountain Pens, Spectacles, Electric Supplies and Auto Tags is at Widney's. 2a3.

Man Wanted: To sell fruit trees, shrubbery, etc., for old reliable firm. Liberal commission payable weekly. The CLYDE NURSERY, Clyde, Ohio. 4t1.

DROPS DEAD WHILE BUTCHERING

Gerry Horn, age 49, dropped dead at his home south of Spencerville, Tuesday morning, while engaged in butchering. He with his sister, Mrs. Ross Abel, lived on the old farm.

The deceased had been troubled with his heart since the age of fifteen years and had consulted many physicians about his affliction.

Coroner John R. Clark of Auburn was called to view the body and death was pronounced due to spasmodic contraction of the cardiac cycle.

The funeral arrangements are made for Friday afternoon at the home. Rev. A. K. Mumma of Harlan officiating.

DIXIE QUARTET PLEASED AUDIENCE

The first number of the Senior Lecture Course was held Tuesday evening in the new gym, and the performers, the Dixie Jubilee Singers, gave an appreciated program, and all ages were entertained. The audience was larger than in past years, due to the nature of the program. The typical southern melodies brought out the harmony of the male voices, for which they received many encores.

Announcement will be made from time to time as to the remaining numbers of he course, and your patronage is appreciated by the Seniors.

New Clothes for Old Ones

If the old house isn't just right, why not bring it up to present-day standards by a little of the right kind of remodeling and repair?

Perhaps you will need to put in a permanent concrete foundation and basement floor and renew porches and steps with concrete in the spring.

Another big improvement, the most effective modernizing touch, will be an overcoat of Universal cement stucco, applied right over the old walls, whatever they are. You'll worry less about fire, repairs and painting, and besides the winters will be more mild to the folks living inside.

Just ask for suggestions and get a free copy of our booklet, "Recommended Practice for Portland Cement Stucco."

The DAIRY

COMPLEX FEEDS FOR DAIRY COW

When an animal is well it does not need medicine, and when it is sick it needs specific treatment for its disease. For this reason, dairymen who buy complex mineral mixtures to feed to their animals are not only wasting their money but may be harming their cattle as well, according to Prof. L. A. Maynard at the State College of Agriculture at Ithaca, N. Y.

Aside from common salt, the only minerals that are needed as supplement to ordinary farm rations are calcium, phosphorus, and sometimes iodine. Mixtures containing such substances as glauber's salts, epsom salts, copperas, potassium chloride, sulphur, iron oxide, and other condiments have no justification from the standpoint of nutrition, and the continued feeding of them may be positively harmful.

Magnesium, iron, potassium and sulphur, which are included in most mineral mixtures, are valueless ingredients because common rations are sufficiently rich in them. Laxatives, copperas, sodium bicarbonate, and sulphur are drugs rather than feeds and should not be fed to a well animal.

Some companies argue that epsom salts and glauber's salts are needed in the feed for farm animals because of their laxative action. In answer to this it should be recognized that the best way to make a ration laxative is to select properly the feeds included in it. Furthermore, the small amount of these purgatives in the mineral mixture cannot possibly have the desired effect when an animal is constipated.

Cod liver oil, which is sometimes included in mineral mixtures, helps calcium assimilation in growing pigs, but it has been proved ineffective for dairy cows. Also, when cod liver oil is fed at all, it should be purchased unmixed with other materials, since it gradually loses its value as an aid in calcium assimilation when mixed.

Compounds of calcium and phosphorus which are suitable for feeding may be purchased at from one to three cents a pound. Complex mixtures always sell at much higher prices than this, and the manufacturers try to justify their price by exaggerated and untruthful claims about their value. The complex products are actually worth less than the mixture containing calcium and phosphorus alone because the percentage of the needed minerals is lowered by including the other substances which serve only as a filler.

Pumpkins Useful as Cow Feed During the Winter

Where pumpkins are extensively grown they are used for sow feed in the winter months. Possibly they could be kept all winter under proper conditions of cold storage, but they are such a bulky food that a large place is required to store enough of them to last a large herd through the winter months. They are not only hollow inside, but their shape makes them space consumers in storage. The pumpkin is nearly equivalent to silage for feed, but when we have the problem of feeding many cows, it is much easier to build a silo than to build a receptacle for several tons of pumpkins. Moreover, the pumpkins must be cold enough to prevent them from decaying, for the air will get into any receptacle in which they can be placed. With silage, the temperature makes little difference if it does not reach the point where it freezes. In the feeding of pumpkins about 40 pounds per day per cow may be fed to advantage, and with some cows the milk production will be greatly increased. With some cows, however, the effect of feeding pumpkins is to cause the cow to lay on fat and decrease their milk production.

Dairy Hints

Calves should have fresh water even though they are receiving milk.

* * *

Dairy barns need good floors. Concrete is a fine material for this purpose.

* * *

To insure fall freshening get cows with calf between December 1 and March 1.

Cows that are given a rest of from six to eight weeks and liberally fed before calving usually produce more milk during the succeeding lactation period than cows that calve in thin condition.

* * *

Most cream separators will do a much better job of skimming the milk when it is warm.

* * *

Drinking cups in the barn are a good investment for most dairymen. Cows need lots of water and it should be supplied liberally.

* * *

Select a bull of good individuality. A bull should be equal to, or better in every regard, than the cows he is bred to, or his offspring will be bred down and not up.

LIFE'S LITTLE JESTS

WHY CHANGE?

A friend of ours complains that the coal he gets nowadays isn't what it used to be or what it should be for the cost. We are reminded of the story of an inventor who went to a coal dealer and said: "I have here something that you'll want, something new—a substitute coal that you can sell at half price."

"Shucks!" returned the coal man. "Haven't we got one already that we sell at full price?"—Transcript.

REJECTED

First Pugilist—I'm hard, I am!

Second Pugilist—"Uh, huh! After I investigate your anatomy with my boxing gloves there'll be somebody investigating your anatomy with rubber ones.

A Purist

"Sarah ammoniac—you have it, of course."

"Do you mean sal ammoniac?" asked the druggist.

"I believe it is sometimes called that," replied the lady stiffly.

QUEER QUIRKS IN HUMAN DESTINY

Disobedience Brought Victory

THE disobedience of an army once relieved Europe from a threatened invasion by the Turks who had conquered the Eastern Roman empire, taking Constantinople.

The capital of the Eastern empire fell into the hands of the Turks in 1453 and two years later Muhomet II was hammering at the walls of Belgrade, bent on extending his conquests throughout Europe. The pope and John Capistrano, papal legate and general of the Capuchins, preached a crusade to Europe, but without success. Feudal noblemen prayed and the people slaughtered Jews, it being the naive custom to blame all misfortune on this unhappy race, but armies to fight the Turks were lacking.

At length Capistrano, traveling through Germany and preaching war, gained a few thousand peasant followers. They were armed only with flails and pitchforks but they were ready to die for Christianity. Capistrano bravely led his mob to join John Hunyades and the little Hungarian army, who were planning to relieve the besieged army in Belgrade.

The motley army floated in boats down the Danube, attacked and dispersed the Turkish fleet and entered the beleaguered city. Hunyades, in command, saw little hope of making effective soldiers out of Capistrano's peasants. He sternly forbade an attack upon the Turks, hoping to make a successful resistance within the walls of Belgrade. Artillery of the enemy battered down these walls in time, but the inhabitants of the city had built a secondary line of defense. Encountering the new wall the Turks were discouraged. At this time, the fanatic followers of Capistrano could no longer be restrained. Despite Hunyades' commands and his promise of death to any who disobeyed, they burst over the walls and charged the enemy.

The first intrenchment was taken by storm, then a second and a third. The Turkish host of 160,000 was soon in great disorder. Hunyades, perceiving the success that disobedience to his orders had brought, joined the attack with his cavalry and Mahomet II was beaten. His power was so badly crippled, in fact, that it was many years before he could take the field again.

Patrick Henry's Chance

PATRICK HENRY, the famous colonial patriot, might have remained a handy man around a Virginia inn and the American Revolutionary party would have lacked a powerful leader, if a lawsuit had not arisen in 1763, which no other lawyer of Virginia dared to defend. It was Henry's chance and he made the most of it.

His neighbors laughed heartily when they heard that Patrick Henry was going to be a lawyer. They had known him as a lazy, good-natured fellow, fond of dancing, fishing and playing the fiddle. He had failed as a storekeeper and as a farmer, and was now helping with the general work about his father-in-law's tavern at Hanover Courthouse. When he asked for a license to practice law, the judge examined him and found he knew no law, but he promised faithfully to study and was admitted to practice. Naturally no clients came to a man in whose industry the community had no faith.

There came a time, however, when Patrick Henry found a client. The Church of England was the official church of the colony and the people, many of whom belonged to other sects, were required to pay the Episcopal clergyman whether they attended their churches or not. The house of burgesses had decided against the right of the preachers, but the king had overruled the provincial legislators.

The influences behind the clergymen were powerful. No recognized lawyer in Virginia would defend the people against them, but Patrick Henry said he would. The courtroom was crowded when he left the tavern bar "to plead against the parsons." Most of the visitors had come to laugh at the clownish figure of the attorney. Patrick Henry surprised them. He talked but little about the law, but he placed the authority of the house of burgesses above that of the king. He was accused of treason by counsel for the preachers, but the jury returned with a verdict awarding the clergymen just one cent damages, which meant victory for the young orator.

Patrick Henry was elected to the house of burgesses on the reputation made in that trial and a few years later all of colonial America was thrilling to his defiant words:

"Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!"

Hairs on Human Head

Instruments recently invented are capable of counting the hairs on the head and giving other data of interest to hairdressers. It has been shown that the number of hairs growing on the average head is from 100,000 to 250,000, varying with the texture of the hair. Human hair grows at the rate of half an inch a month.

"Break him!" Mansfield brought his fist down upon his desk. "Break him! I am iron there. I'll tell you why." And he recounted the episode on board the giant Cunarder in 1912.

As he listened to this almost incredible tale the doctor's heart went down, down. The boy loved Betty, had come here to win her and his anger against Mansfield's malefactions had switched him onto another trail. Nancy! Out of all these curious actions and reactions hers would be the broken heart.

He put Cathewe's letter away and got up. "Dunleigh, you're going home to lose your fight. You're going to lose your daughter, too. Tell her, man; tell her why you played such a farce as this real estate deal. Tell her the truth. Tell her that for years you've lived for and by yourself, a monument to selfishness. Tell her you took rents from the plague districts because you'd lost the perspectives of morality. That you never cared who rented the flats and apartments so long as the rents were forthcoming. Tell her you've taken money from honest men, through legal trickery. Tell her that you had forgotten her mother. Lord! Lord! Don't you know that women always forgive if you tell them; that they never forgive if the story comes to them from a third person? You've got the idea that you must cringe. Tell her with your chin up. If you've got to lose her, lose her like a sportsman," and the indignant Maddox rushed out of the study and out of the house.

Mansfield, with a rather childish burst of fury against the tides of fate that were closing in upon him, stalked to the study door and locked it. How many times did he stride from the fireplace to the far wall and back? A hundred times two, three hundred times.

Until this hour he had looked upon the real-estate deal with a kind of dry humor. When the hour came he would refund Betty's outlay. Wasn't that enough?

He dropped into his club at five and decided to dine there. He was still in a towering rage, and he did not care to face the girl's clear eyes until he had himself in hand. But he brought home some new books and a box of candy, which he placed before her door

* * * * * * *

As Maddox entered his house he was greeted by a question from Nancy.

"Did you order that awning?"

"Awning?"

"Heavens, he's forgotten! Don't you know what day this is?"

"Thursday."

"What date?"

He looked at his calendar and then his jaw dropped. Her birthday, and he had forgotten all about it! He jumped up, kissed her, and stormed back to the office where he had left his hat and coat. He rushed out and down to the chariot and went clattering off. He did not stop until he reached the shop of Bannister's fashionable jewelers. He was a rare visitor, but they knew him well.

"Daniels," he began, a little out of breath, "this is my daughter Nancy's birthday. I want a trinket that'll make her forget everything, even the day she was born," he added humorously.

"That falls in nicely," replied the jeweler. "We had something in the window the other day that attracted her."

"I see," said Maddox, preparing himself for the worst. "Pearls. Well, let me see it." So far as he was concerned, pills and pearls looked exactly alike. He would have to trust Daniels absolutely. "How much?" he asked, after a glance at the string.

"Twenty-five hundred."

"Wrap it up—and charge. A thousand December first and the balance January first.

"Six months, if you like. We folks make you wait often enough."

From her bedroom window Nancy saw her father's return; but she did not run down to greet him. She was wondering what would happen when Brand and Betty Mansfield saw each other across the table at dinner that evening.

* * * * * * *

Cathewe returned from New York that morning. He was not aware that a man, very much interested in his affairs, followed him out of the car and to the taxicab stand. He sent a cold, level glance into the middle of Cathewe's back. At the taxicab stand he selected a cab for himself and directed the chauffeur to proceed at once to Dunleigh Mansfield's on Polygon hill. There will be no more of him. He comes into the story, and goes out of it, comet-wise. But an astronomer will tell you that the aftermath of comets is devastation, annihilation, and obliteration. How many times, though, has this old top stood wincing for the blow, to escape by a hair—the hair of the comet's tail?

Cathewe had an appointment at the office. The appointee was not a willing one; he was bowing to force. When he arrived his air was nonchalant, except for the restless and continuous shifting of the strong cigar from one corner of his mouth to the other.

"Well, here I am," he said impudently.

"Sit down, Shafer. Now, exactly, why did you, a member of the city's detective force, enter my home like a burglar and break into my safe?"

"Because we had information that you might be some kind of a crook," was the ready answer.

"You lie, Shafer. I'm going to give you a month to find a new job out of town. Oh, I shouldn't have sent for you if I hadn't something on you, as you would say."

"Nothing doing," answered the detective.

"I'm not going to say any more. The interview is over. Good morning. Thirty days, . . . or five years."

"What's that?"

"Five years. The evidence I have against you may be computed in so much prison time. Good morning."

The blood boiled up in the detective's face; but the cold blue eyes looking up into his made him reconsider the impulse to start something of a purely physical nature. He left.

Cathewe swung his chair around to his desk just as the telephone rang.

It was Nancy, who wanted to make sure that he would attend her birthday dinner.

A pause. "Sure I'll be there," he answered.

"Brand, how came you to make those curious little periods in your manuscripts?"

"Periods. Oh, I see. You mean the cross. That is the habit of newspaper writers. It is to indicate to the compositor that the sentence ends there."

"Ah! I was just curious. Now I understand. At seven, then, Mr. Cottar!"

She left the phone and saw Betty, who had just come in, standing in the hall.

"I received a letter this morning," said Betty, slowly.

"A letter?"

"Don't you remember?"

"You mean a letter from that shadow man you told me about in Washington?"

"Yes. . . . I. . . I had to sit down when I saw that envelope. My knees wouldn't hold me up."

"Was it postmarked New York?"

"Yes. It isn't fair. The whole thing hasn't been fair. I had never injured anyone. I wasn't a flirt. The letter, Nancy, was goodby."

"You'll get over it, dear?" said Nancy, hating herself. A word or two, and the riddle would be solved. Generous beyond ordinary, she stifled the impulse to take that page of manuscript from her bosom and spread it out for Betty to see. Once, indeed, her hand did steal up; but stonily she forced it down. What was the use in telling Betty? said Specious Argument. Wasn't there the width of the poles between Betty Mansfield and this shadow man? Hadn't he himself made it impossible?

CHAPTER VIII

On the morning that Cathewe arrived from New York the cub reporter, an industrious chap, got down before lunch and went into the file room. Using his penknife he hacked out every editorial and news story he could find relating to Mansfield. When this task was completed he put them into a manila envelope, sealed and stamped it, and carried it over to the post office, where he dropped it into the local mail-slot.

Then he was suddenly seized with regret and wished he had used more discretion.

He quitted the post office for the street, and walked half a block. There was no use arguing; he would have to get that letter back. He turned and trotted back to the post office, entered one of its rear doors and interviewed the chief clerk.

"Can't be done," the latter replied. "It'll have to go through."

That seemed final.

The cub saw that the case was hopeless. Utterly miserable, he turned into a side street and sought a favorite haunt of his—a buffet-saloon. He ordered a plate of hash and a cup of coffee and was striving to swallow without choking when his "listening in" faculties were aroused by a snatch of conversation in the next booth.

"Tonight—guard at the south gate—more isolated."

Once in the street he made for the police station as fast as his legs could carry him. He dashed into the day captain's office. He made a bad beginning. He introduced himself and his paper.

"Huh! Well, whadda yuh want?"

"Overheard somebody in Cahill's talking about blowing up something tonight. They're there yet. Can you give me a couple of men?"

"On your way! Everybody's seeing things."

"You refuse?"

"Clear out!" belligerently. "The Herald ain't too popular in here, Mog!"

The reporter ran back to Cahill's, and the blood jumped into his throat when he observed that the men had not yet gone. Thrilled, he sat down and ordered another cup of coffee. He would trail these chaps; and trail them he did. North, east, south and west, through this alley and that, toward the country, back to town, off for the railroad yard and back to Cahill's.

They kept him there at Cahill's until 9 o'clock that night.

At nine the men departed, and the cub began his trailing again. This time there were no tortuous windings. The men headed directly toward the railway yard, and the cub decided that they were going to wreck the Mansfield steel mills.

Suddenly his men vanished. The boy fell into a dog-trot to the end of a string of empty freight cars. As he passed the last car, the sky fell out. When he came to his senses he could see the cold starry sky above him. It had stopped snowing earlier in the evening. He was at the bottom of a coal car, which might be hauled to the main line at any moment. In that event he would breakfast somewhere around Scranton.

It was midnight when he climbed the stairs to the editorial rooms. His face and hands were streaked with blood and coal-dust; he was a sartorial as well as a physical wreck. Instinctively, he staggered toward Cathewe's door—open as usual—because he knew that the chief would not laugh at him.

"Chief!" began the boy, rocking on his heels. "They—got me!—I was a boob to try it a—alone! But I thought—if I reported here, you'd laugh or send somebody else. Anyhow I tried—"

Cathewe turned his head and sprang to his feet just in time to catch the boy as he pitched forward.

* * * * * * *

Before leaving for Nancy's that night Betty told her father that she, too, held Cathewe in the hollow of her hand and could crush him at will. She kissed him and sped to the door, where she paused for a second. What a handsome man he was, this daddy of hers! In after days she always thanked God for that glance; for she never saw her father's face like that again.

Mansfield selected a cigar, forgetting his own dinner was in the process of making, and blew a cloud above his head. What the dickens had the child discovered concerning Cathewe, Cathewe the impeccable, at least here in Bannister? What had she discovered that the local police force could not? The hollow of her hand, she had said. She was her father's daughter.

Day of Realization for Conceit's Victim

Conceit is something like red paint. The first time one tries it, even a trifle of it looks bad. The next time it doesn't look so bad. The third time you put on a little more to make it look better. Then you have to keep adding a dab or two a day to make you feel toward yourself the way you felt on the first day you tried it.

Everybody else knows this but you. You carry your conceit about you so plainly that even in your silence it is evident.

But nobody dares tell you about it, and if he did you wouldn't believe him. Until one day, after you have struggled and suffered and risen above things and fallen and got up and are forty and have married and are growing slightly grey, a little miss of ten climbs on your knee, and grabs your cheeks in both hands, and—yes, right there in the presence of horrid relatives—blurts out: "Daddy, mamma says you are the most conceited man she knows."

And then you know.—Kansas City Star.

Constellation in Sky

Orion is the name of a constellation known to the ancients. It contains stars of the first, second and lesser magnitudes, and is popularly recognized by three collinear stars forming the "belt of Orion."

South American Art

Quito, the capital of Ecuador, the second highest townsite in the world (9,000 feet above sea level) is regarded as the cradle of South American art. Franciscan monks took workmen thither, and one of the most beautiful of buildings is the San Francis church at Quito. It took 100 years to erect, after its construction had begun in 1535. Much of its internal work is designed in the Moorish style, while parts of the building favor Indo-Chinese, mingled with Roman and Gothic examples of decorative taste.

BRIGHT HATS OF VELVET; WASH FABRICS FOR TOTS

A VELVET hat this season is either very stylish or it isn't—it all depends. To win the mode's approval this season the velvet hat must possess chic in the truest sense of the word. Ordinary, commonplace velvet headwear plays no part in this season's fashions—but the velvet chapeau of commanding smartness, that is a different story.

Because the bright velvet hat so enlivens somber furs, and because the velvet hat is flattering to its owner, it remains the choice of women of fashion who are weary of the little felt shapes, and who take no interest in the glittering gold and silver hats such as are so "popular" this season.

Hats for Midwinter.

Each of the velvet hats here interpret some one or more inimitable style touches; that is why they were so carefully selected for illustration. There is that perky little velvet toque shown second at the top. It requires the skill of the "milliner born" to produce anything so effective and of such artful simplicity as this model.

The other black velvet toque in the picture uses a cleverly posed feather to convey a convincing style message.

Two of the velvet toques, as here shown, bespeak the unusual in that they are embroidered in white pearls. That is, the very attractive model at the right center is pearl embroidered. The little toque shown centered to the left prefers to wear its pearls in the form of wing-shaped effects posed to one side.

The compose velvet hat is one of the style items featured this season. For it the milliner employs two or three colored velvets. An ombre effect is attained in this way, by the velvet model below to the left in that it employs three velvets, pale green, reseda green and deep jungle green.

For the shirred velvet model illustrated to the right, at the top, the designer chooses nasturtium colored velvet, alternating this with beige.

When winter begins its lingering farewell and signs of spring timidly appear, mother's fancy gaily turns to thoughts of sewing for the children. Yes, "gaily" is a word well taken, for isn't it fun to make pretty clothes for little tots? Just in choosing the materials, there is a lot of joy. The very breath of spring is in the fresh ginghams, the crisp organdies, sheer swisses, and voiles which flaunt their gay colors from the counters of every washgoods section.

If one plans to decorate the kiddies' frocks with lots of handwork, then of course the plain solid colors are wanted and they are to be found in cotton broadcloths, pongees, fine sateens and linens—materials most suitable for early spring. Among the newest items is rayon alpaca—and a delightful fabric it is, never losing its silky sheen after going through the laundry.

As to embroidery there is no end to the novel new ideas. Among the cleverest is that of working bright solid colored fabrics which launder with gay woolen yarn, in cunning flower clusters. Another interesting trend in decorative handwork is to combine conventional hemstitching or faggoting with natural flower designing. The picture shows the idea. Not only does this look lovely on plain backgrounds, but done in crosswork stitch on gingham checks for the hemline and the upright stem-like lines, the effect is unique, especially if daisies done in "lazy-daisy" stitch are added.

Most dresses for the very little tots subscribe to the full-from-the-shoulder line, achieved through plaits or shir

The automobile has brought about a great many changes, including the decline of the blacksmith shop and decreased attendance in churches, but for every blacksmith given up, three automobile service stations and at least one garage have been established.

Mrs. George Pervines of Osseo Mich., better known as Pearl Hendricks, a former resident of St. Joe, was buried last Friday. As we reported in The News before, she had been in poor health for months with tuberculosis and that the daughter was caring for the household duties.

Mrs. Minerva Wise died at 1:30 o'clock Saturday morning at the home of her daughter, Mrs. H. M. Phillips at Auburn, at the age of eighty-seven years and nineteen days. Her death came as the result of cancer after a serious illness of nearly a year. She was a member of the Rehoboth Church.

William E. Rose, an Ashley insurance man, was arrested Sunday night by Sheriff John C. Armstrong and his deputy, Arden Morr on a charge of driving an automobile while intoxicated. The affidavit was signed by Chas. F. Lorah of Garrett, who Rose forced to the ditch when passing on the Auburn-Garrett road. He entered a plea of not guilty. Rose was apprehended north of Auburn and in the ditch at that, yet not guilty.

S. H. Maurer of Auburn, in a complaint filed in the DeKalb circuit court, alleges that Gilbert D. and Lottie M. Shelkett have failed to pay three $60 notes, one due cuted Feb. 8, 1926, and due in six months, another of the same date due in nine months and another of the same date due in a year. A judgment of $250 is asked. Mr. Maurer in another complaint states that Shelkett executed a note for $60 March 4, 1926, that has not been paid. A judgment of $100 is demanded.

The monthly council meeting of the Christian Church will be held next Monday night at the church. Mr. Ed Storer will conduct a round table discussion on why the Sunday School should adopt the International Sunday School Standard. The young peoples class with Mrs. Anna Koch, teacher, will have charge of the program following the discussion. These council meetings are a great help and inspiration to the Sunday School and every officer and member interested in having a better Sunday School is urged to be present.

Charles Davis, Chief of Police, of Auburn, says:—"It has been brought to my attention recently that cigarettes are being sold to minors, especially those of high school age. It is illegal for dealers to sell cigarettes to youths under the age of twenty-one. An investigation is under way in Auburn to determine where cigarettes are being sold and unless the practice is stopped there will be prosecutions. This department intends to keep close touch on the situation. Those who sell to minors will be watched and reported from this date. Stop selling if you do not care to be prosecuted. And the same thing is taking place in St. Joe practically every day.

John F. Hart of St. Joe has filed a petition in the DetKalb circuit ocurt for the appointment of a guardian for Franklin P. Hart, who, the petition states, is incompetent because of old age and infirmities. Mr. Hart is in a critical condition at the home of his son.

John George atended the Dyers and Cleaners convention last week at West Baden, Ind., endeavoring to get onto new ways of doing things. John now has a modern plant at Auburn and is branching out so that he has business coming to him by mail from a great distance.

A move at the present session of the state legislature to boost the state gasoline tax to five cents and make a drastic reduction in the cost of auto licenses was under consideration, Thursday. The plan is to make all pleasure cars $1.00 and with 5 cents per gallon tax on gas would increase the revenue many times.

The bill raising the speed limit to forty miles does little more than legalize a general practice. It should not be regarded as condoning reckless driving or speeding, but simply as recognition of the fact that the improvement both in highways and in automobile construction has tended to make a speed of forty miles an hour less hazardous than it formerly was considered. The type known as speeders would not be affected by the proposed legislation, as they already scorn the present limit by driving from fifty to sixty miles an hour. A forty-mile speed is not dangerous provided the driver is careful and experienced and makes due allowance for traffic conditions encountered.

The New Year's Eve Wedding

By MARION R. REAGAN

NEW YEAR'S EVE was set as the date for the wedding of Bob Wallins and Charlotte Main. Their friends thought, and so did they, that it would mean excellent luck to begin the New Year as man and wife. But as the time drew nearer, Bob, at least, began to have fears and forebodings, not so much about the day as about the event itself. Marriage was a serious thing. And after reflecting a long time on the subject—perhaps too long, he wasn't so sure that he was taking a wise step after all. It would have made things easier if Bob's mother had agreed with him, but she hadn't. Charlotte was her idea of the right kind of a girl for any young man to marry. She was thrifty, domestic and sensible. Sensible! She was too sensible, Bob thought. He would have liked her to be just a little bit foolish. Girls were supposed to be a little silly. That's what made them feminine! Still he had come to rely on her judgment and it would have been annoying to have found her undependable. She was a good pal and all that, and he liked her; of course he liked her. But was that love? Was that romance? Other fellows felt poetic about the girls they were about to marry; couldn't sleep at night for thinking of them; couldn't eat, and the whole state was described as "love." Well, Bob never felt that way about Charlotte. His appetite was as good as ever and he was a long way from insomnia.

Then he met Helen McKay at a house party, and his digestion at once began to suffer. It somehow took him a long time to go to sleep at night and during the day his mind was in a fog. He couldn't concentrate on business at all. Helen McKay with her trim figure and stylish clothes, her carmined lips and rouged cheeks, her artful, vampish ways, came tripping into his thoughts constantly. There was a girl, he thought—there was a girl.

He wouldn't have hurt Charlotte's feelings for the world, but he was plainly enamored of Helen, and surely he could go out with her a few times without Charlotte's finding out? He did; but Charlotte found out.

At first she was blindly jealous. She packed the diamond engagement ring into its little box, and was about to mail it back to him when her old good sense returned. To send back the ring would have been to admit defeat. The only wise thing to do was to laugh and beat Bob at his own game. She determined to dress up and vamp another man.

A likely "prospect" appeared in Sam Peck. Sam had just come to Quincy from New York, and with his worldly manner and handsome face was enough to arouse the jealousies of Bob Wallins, thought Charlotte, and she started out on her campaign. She had been wearing old dowdy dresses, saving her new things for her trousseau, but now she took out the new clothes, and in addition bought herself a lipstick and innumerable jars of make-up. For hours she sat at her mirror, "practicing." Evidently she became quite skillful, for Samuel Peck very easily did what is known as "falling hard," and soon Sam and Charlotte appeared at parties together. Bob stormed and raged. He threatened to break off their engagement, but when he found how apparently ready Charlotte was to have the engagement broken, he changed his attitude. He simply couldn't get over Charlotte acting that way. He became so worried about Charlotte that he forgot Helen completely.

One Sunday evening he went over to Charlotte's to call. She was tantalizingly gay, as she was always lately. Bob sank down in a chair, sullenly.

"People are beginning to talk," he said briefly.

"They are? About what, or whom?"

"About you."

"About me? How interesting! I didn't know that, and what do they say about me—complimentary things, I hope?"

Bob got up and walked back and forth in front of the fireplace.

"Likely. An engaged girl who begins to play around with another fellow scandalously, and to use that vulgar-looking make-up is liable to be held up as a model young woman to the Women's Bible class, I suppose?"

"I've always got along very well with the Women's Bible class, but what right have you to criticize?"

"You're engaged to me!"

"Yes, but that can be broken. You were engaged to me, too, when you started going with that Helen McKay."

"Who?"

"Helen McKay."

"Charlotte, don't be ridiculous. I didn't mean that seriously at all. I'd even forgotten for a minute who in the world she was."

"You forget women rather quickly, it seems to me."

"Look here, Charlotte, I'm tired of this. You've got to make up your mind right now whether you're going to be your old self and marry me New Year's Eve as you promised, or not. But remember, I can't possibly love you as I always—yes, always—have, unless you take off that terrible-looking make-up." The conversation took a very unsatisfactory trend after that, and Bob left, swearing he was "off women for life."

The New Year's Eve wedding was called off. Bob Wallins became one of the worst grouches in town. He was never seen except at his office or home, while Charlotte came to look more and more worried.

Then came the reconciliation, and as the two sat one evening sending out invitations to the New Year's Eve dinner that was to culminate in their marriage, Bob said, "Gee, Charlotte, I'm glad we got all our quarreling over before our wedding, aren't you? Because we certainly are never going to have even the least argument again."
